

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

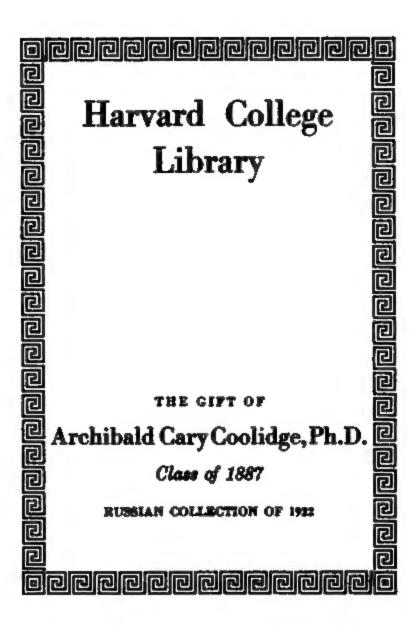

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

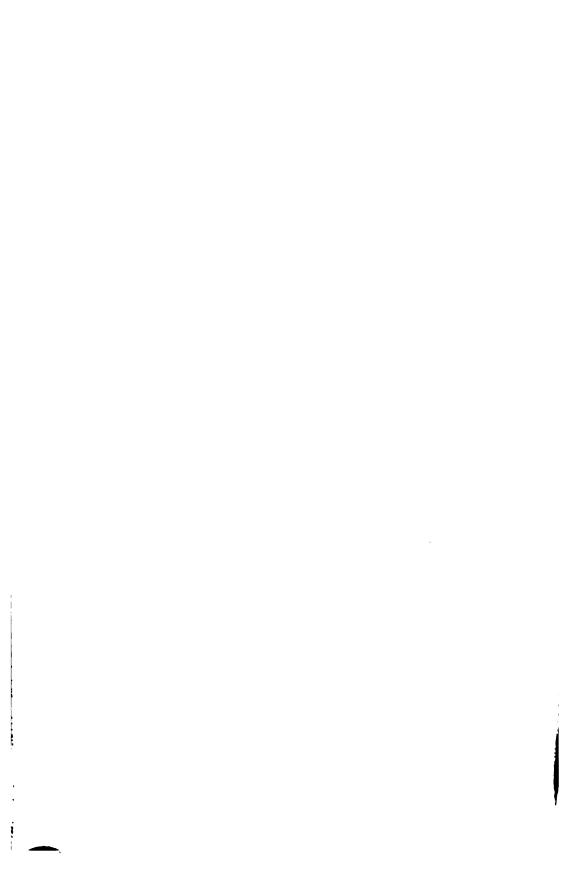

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

THE Author of this volume deems it quite unnecessary to introduce it to the reader by any lengthened prefatory remarks, as the work itself is altogether of a miscellaneous character. It is compiled, principally, from his journal notes and observations, made during his extensive tours in Russia, in the service of the British and Foreign Bible Society: upon these he has engrafted a considerable portion of information, derived from Russian authors and other authentic sources, illustrative of the character, and of the past and present condition of the Russian People, their ecclesiastical establishment, and the state of civilization among He has had peculiarly favourable opportunities for observing the usages and studying the character of the Russians, through his knowledge of their language, and his intimate relation, for many years, with the Clergy, Nobility, and other ranks.

That portion of the volume which describes the condition of the Russian Serfs, the state of the Hospitals and Prisons, the labours of the Russian Bible Society, and the religious character of the late Emperor Alexander, will, he trusts, prove acceptable to the numerous friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The Discourses in the Appendix afford a specimen of the style of preaching which prevails among the Russian Clergy.

The Plates, illustrative of the dress and amusements of the people, have been selected from a collection of lithographic costumes, which the Author brought with him from Russia.

In conclusion, he offers this volume to his numerous friends and subscribers; sensible of its imperfections, yet not without a hope, that it will convey to them some instructive information, and enable them to form a just estimate of the character of this mighty people, concerning whom the most various and contradictory statements have been given to the British Public.

RUSSIA.

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

Boundaries of Russia, Ancient and Modern—Increase of Territory and Population—The Russian Army—Navy—Cities and Towns—Agriculture—Vineyards and Orchards—Forests—Manufactories—Commerce, by sea and land—Amount of Exports and Imports—Mints, and Circulating Medium—Revenue—Concluding Observations.

THE period in History is still very recent, at which the vast extent of country now composing the Russian Empire began to unfold its dimensions to the civilized nations of Western Europe. Since that time, the Government of Russia has laudably exerted its influence, not only to obtain a correct knowledge of the numerous tribes of mankind who roam over the wilds of Asiatic and the Northern parts of European Russia, but also to examine into the natural resources of those countries. and their applicability to the purposes of civilized life. This inquiry, carried on since the time of Peter I., has shewn, that this empire possesses internal resources, calculated to support its hundred tribes, even when their present population shall have reached a tenfold augmentation of number; that its seas, lakes, navigable rivers, forests, fisheries, minerals, vegetable products, and almost boundless extent of arable land, afford abundant stores, which, until now, have been but partially discovered or drawn forth. Indeed, the scantiness of population, and the want of civilization among most of these tribes, have rendered such a task impossible. But every year is making new discoveries in these rich fields of research; though it may truly be said, that the natural resources of this mighty empire are still but imperfectly known to its own inhabitants. On the other hand, it must be conceded that the exertions of the Government of Russia to introduce civilization and the knowledge of the Arts and Sciences into the European parts of the empire have been distinguished not less by bold comprehensive plans than by great energy in execution; and these have produced, and are still every year producing, such changes, that no statistical account of this country can be given which will hold correct for any length of time. What one describes to-day may, by an edict, be entirely newmoulded to-morrow. No institutions remain stable for any length of time, in the present state of the empire: they are all liable to be thrown down, remodelled, or annihilated, by the power of the autocratic lever, called an "Iminoe Ukas." And though the constant progress of the nation towards a higher degree of culture, and of political and commercial influence, renders such changes in many respects indispensable, yet how often do the interests of individuals, or of a party, unite in misleading the mind of the sovereign, and inducing him to issue new edicts, by which the best and most wisely-laid plans of his predecessors are arrested in their progress or overturned, and the finest plants torn up by the root ere they have had time to bring fruit to maturity, in order to give place to new schemes, often far less adapted to promote the general good of his people!-Amidst these disadvantages, we shall here bring forward a few statistical sketches, the materials of which we have chiefly taken from Russian publications; and these will, in some measure, prepare the reader for the further details contained in the work itself.

Some of the most intelligent native authors are now of opinion that the Russians* are originally of Scandinavian origin, springing from the same ancestors with the Swedes; and that they inhabited the shores of the Gulf of Finland, until their union with the Slavonic tribes in the ninth century, at the foundation of the Russian monarchy under Rurick. At that period, the following tribes are recorded as inhabiting the extensive regions lying betwixt Finland and the Ural Mountains. the White Sea. and the banks of the Dwina and frontier of Poland: 1. The Krivitsi, near the sources of the Wolga, Dwina, and Dnieper. 2. Polotsi, near where the River Polot falls into the Dwina. 3. Dragovitsi, betwixt the Dwina and Prepita. 4. Poliani, on the Dnieper, near Kief. 5. Radimitsi, on the banks of the River Sodje. 6. Viatitsi, on the River Oka. 7. Severiani, on the River 8. Budjiani, on the River Bugh. 9. Uglitzi, on the River Orel. 10. Dulebi, on the River Bugh. 11. Lutitzi; and, 12. Tivertsi, on the Dwina and Danube, towards the Black Sea. These, and many other tribes of Finnish, Hunnish, and Sarmatic origin, though united under one government, long retained their peculiar characteristics; so that even at this day we find, in some of the provinces of Russia, traces of the ancient distinctions of its inhabitants, in their character, dress, especially the head-dresses of the females, peculiar usages, and even in the dialects spoken by them. Thus the Mordvi, Tschuvashi, Tscheremisi, Zeriani, Koreli, Finns, and others, still continue to speak their own dialects; and it is to the benevolent labours of the Russian Bible Society that the three first are now indebted for the New Testament, for the first time, in their native tongues.

^{*} Until the time of Ioan Vasillivitch Groznoi, the country was called Rusia; but in the time of the Metropolitan Makario they began to write the first syllable of the name sometimes with an o instead of an u. This undetermined orthography continued till the time of Alexie Michaelovitch, when the form Rossia was generally adopted, instead of Rusia.

In the 13th century, the irruptions of the Mongolians, who penetrated westward as far as Novogorod, reduced the Tzars and their subjects under their sway, and kept them in bondage for nearly three hundred years; until their great deliverer, Ioan Vasillivitch, roused the energies of the natives to cast off the Tartar voke, and led the Russians on to subdue their powerful oppres-Since their emancipation from the yoke of the successors of Jingis Khan, in the middle of the 15th century, the Russians have extended their dominions by conquest, in an almost unprecedented manner, until their empire now far surpasses in extent that of Rome in the meridian of her power. This extraordinary accession of territory and population has advanced, in steady progression, from the period above mentioned to the present day; nor is it possible to affix any probable limits to its further advances, especially towards the south-east and south. Let us, however, glance at the growth of this mighty colossus of modern times, which already throws into the scale of European affairs such a preponderating influence, and which probably is destined to act a still more prominent part among the nations.

In 1462, when Ioan Vasillivitch ascended the throne of the Tzars of Muscovy, the whole extent of his dominions was estimated at about 18,200 square miles; but when Ioan Vasillivitch Grosnoi came to the throne, in 1533, it was already more than doubled; and at his death, in 1584, it encompassed 144,000 square miles. When the present dynasty of Romanoff was elected by the assembled Boiars and Clergy, in 1613, and Michael Feodrovitch was raised to the throne, his dominions were nearly the same in extent as at the death of Ioan Vasillivitch; but in 1645, when he left them to his son Alexie, they were enlarged to 258,000 square miles. Peter the Great extended considerably the limits of the empire; and at the accession of his daughter Elizabeth, in 1741, they included 325,000 square miles. Catherine the Second also added to the empire; and at the death of Alexander, its surface was calculated to contain an area of 340,000 German square miles: so that in the course of 364 years, Russia has increased, in extent of territory, nearly twenty fold!

Nor is the increase of population in the last 100 years less remarkable, though more thinly scattered over its immense extent than in the thinnest inhabited parts of Europe. The first census taken by order of Peter the Great, in 1722, gave the number of males paying taxes at 5,794,928; and if we give an equal proportion of females, the whole of his subjects, exclusive of the clergy. nobility, and army, amounted to 11,589,856 souls. But in the sixth revision, made in 1812, this population was found to have augmented to 37,700,000 souls, though the accessions by conquest were estimated only at fifteen millions: and in the present day, according to the last statistical accounts, the population of the Russian empire is estimated at upwards of fifty-four millions; of whom about thirty-six millions are native Russians, speaking the same language, and belonging to the national or Oriental Church. The Poles and Lithuanians belonging to the empire amount to about eight millions, and are mostly Roman Catholics. The Finns, Livonians, Esthonians. and Germans, are Protestants, and are estimated at three Jews, two millions. The Caucasian, Crimean, Kazan, Astrachan, Bashkeer, Kirgizian, and Siberian Tartars, are all Mohammedans, and probably do not amount to more than two millions. The Mongolian, Kalmuk, Manjur, and other heathen tribes of Siberia, whose numbers do not exceed one million, belong to the Buddhist and Shaman systems of idolatry. The Georgian nation, with the recently-conquered provinces of Persia and the Armenians, amount to about one million and a half.

- 1. The nobility (males only) 225,000
- 2. The clergy 243,500
- 3. Officers and servants in the Civil department,750,000 The emancipated peasantry (males only) . 550,000 Free-born Russian peasantry (males only)

97.000

From these estimates it is manifest, that, within the last century, the population of Russia, irrespective of its accessions by conquest, and notwithstanding the bloody wars in which it has been almost constantly engaged. has more than doubled itself by natural causes. Nor can we be surprised at this rapid increase of the human race, if, in addition to the extraordinary longevity so common among the people, we attend to the statements given in the registers which are kept by the bishops, and annually transmitted to the Synod and published. From these, the following extraordinary results are drawn; that the proportion of males to females is as 44 to 40; of annual births, 1 in 25; of deaths, 1 in 40; of marriages, 1 in 100; and that the proportion of births to deaths is as 16 to 10!

The military forces of Russia have also increased nearly tenfold within the last hundred years:

| in 1724 | they | amounted to | | | • | 115,000 r | nen, | |
| 1771 | • | | • | | • | | 240,000 | |
| 1808 | • | | | • | | | 700,000 | |
| 1812 | | | | | | | 1,300,000 | |

and at the present time they are estimated at about 900,000.

This estimate includes the whole of the military force, regular and irregular. The regular army is composed of infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers. The Guards consist of ten regiments of foot, and eight regiments of horse, usually stationed in and around St. Petersburg, and amount to above 40,000 men. These compose the flower of the Russian army, than which a better disciplined, better mounted, and finer body of men is not to be seen in Europe.

The principal military force of the empire is divided into two armies, that occupy the whole extent of the western and southern frontier of European Russia, from the shores of the Baltic to the mouths of the Danube. The armies are divided into corps; these latter into divisions; and the divisions into brigades, each of which consists of two regiments.

The armies of Finland, Georgia, Orenburg, and Siberia are not included in these two expanded wings of the Russian eagle.

The expense of this extensive military establishment is small, in comparison to that of other European forces; but still so great, as at present, with the navy, to consume nearly one half of the revenues of the crown, viz. from 180 to 220 millions of roubles annually.

In the present day, the Russian naval strength consists of about 50 ships of the line, 40 frigates, and 900 smaller vessels, galleys, &c. These carry 6000 guns of different calibre. The number of men employed is about 80,000; and the support of this naval establishment costs the crown 30 millions of roubles annually. Cronstadt, on the Gulf of Finland; Nicholaief, on the Bugh; and Sevastopol, on the Black Sea, are the principal stations for the Russian marine forces.

There are 634 towns scattered throughout the empire; which, in respect of population, may be divided into six classes, not including the capitals.

From 20 to 15,000—Revel, Tobolsk, Witepsk, Tamboff, &c.

Towns somewhat above 10,000 inhabitants, are, Penza, Eletz, Nijnia-Novogorod, Simbirsk, Nejin, Irkutsk, Smolensk, Kozloff, Ahtirka, Minsk, Archangel, Mittau, Grodna, Harkoff, Torjok, Poltava, Kostroma, Pleskoff.

Of the third class, there are 85 towns of from 10 to 5000 inhabitants.

Of the fourth class, there are 214 towns having from 2 to 5000 inhabitants.

Of the fifth class, there are 129 towns with from 1000 to 2000 inhabitants each.

Of the sixth class, there are 113 towns having somewhat below 1000 inhabitants each.

The whole number of inhabitants of these 634 towns is only about 3,000,000; a very small proportion indeed, among a population of 54,000,000, living in villages, hamlets, and tents.

It was calculated that, in 1810, about eighteen millions of peasantry were employed in agriculture, upon sixty-two millions of doesateens * of land in European Russia. On these they raised about 200 millions of tschetverts † of corn and other produce, which was estimated at 800 millions of roubles; of which sum, 500 millions were for rye and oats; the other 300 millions, for wheat, millet, barley, flax, hemp, tobacco, &c. &c. After the wants of the population were supplied, about thirty millions of tschetverts of corn remained for exportation.

The most favourable soils for raising grain are the banks of the Oka and Wolga, and about the Carpathian Range; where they calculate that the proportion of arable ground, in the whole extent of the country, is one doesateen in three. The most sterile parts are the northern, and the extensive steppes in European and Asiatic Russia; but chiefly in the latter, where the arable land is only a twentieth part of the whole extent.

The only parts of the Russian empire where the vine can be cultivated lie betwixt the 48th and 40th degree of latitude. In different parts on the River Don, I found an agreeable light wine, which much resembles Champaign. The best is called Tsemlinskoi, from the village where it is made.

The southern shores and middle parts of the Crimea are very productive of wine; but it is all of an inferior quality, and is usually drunk the same year that it is made. The vine thrives also along the northern bases of the Caucasus, on the rivers Kuban, Kuma, and Terik. Extensive vineyards are cultivated near the town of Kizliar, where a light wine is made, called tscheheer, which is used throughout the whole country, in lieu of beer. On the River Kuma, at Madjar, I found, in 1806, a colony of Armenians cultivating the vine with success, but not to any great extent.

^{*} A doesateen contains 7477 square yards and two feet.

^{† 100} Russian tschetverts of corn are equal to sixty-eight quarters English.

At the Moravian settlement of Sarepta, on the River Sarpa, the vine thrives; but the quantity of wine is inconsiderable, and the quality is indifferent. At Astrachan there are extensive vineyards, of which the fruit is excellent: they are cultivated, not so much for the purpose of making wine, as for the sake of the grapes, which are sent, in vast quantities, to supply the tables of the great in the two capitals. They are transported in small casks of millet-seed, which completely fills the interstices betwixt the grapes, and preserves the bunches in great perfection. The whole quantity of wine produced in the southern provinces of Russia is mostly used in those parts: it forms but a small part of what is needed for the consumption of the empire; for foreign wines are annually imported, to the amount of four millions of roubles.

In the middle and southern provinces, especially in the governments of Vladimir, Tambof, and Orel, apples, pears, cherries, plums, and other fruits common to temperate climates, are cultivated in great abundance.

The forests in European Russia are computed to cover 180 millions of doesateens, or nearly one half of the whole country! These woods abound most in the northern and middle provinces; and consist chiefly of different kinds of pine, birch, larch, lime, alder, maple, and willow: in the southern districts, such as the governments of Astrachan, Caucasus, the Crimea, Podolia, and White Russia, they do not occupy more than one thirtieth part of the country. Of this immense property in forests, about 120 millions of doesateens belong to Government, and sixty millions to the nobility.

The best oak, ash, beech, elm, and other hard wood fit for ship-building, is found in those forests where the land is richest—in the central governments, on the banks of the Wolga, Oka, and Ural. The extent of these forests is estimated at fourteen millions of doesateens.

The exports of wood, tar, pitch, turpentine, potashes, &c., amount to many millions of roubles annually.

Of the Russian manufactories, it may be stated in general, that, on account of the low state of civilization, they labour under great disadvantages, and rest on a very unstable foundation, in consequence of the frequent changes made by the Government in their tariffs: yet they have greatly increased within the last fifty years, and supply the wants of the most numerous class of the inhabitants with articles in quality suited to their present low state in society. It can never be expected that the Russian manufactories generally will equal those of Western Europe, until the wants of the nation more resemble those of civilized countries; for there must be a correspondence between the qualities of the articles manufactured, and the habits of those who use them. Such change is the work of ages, and cannot be forced; though it may well be nourished by the powerful aid of a wise and paternal government.

As the produce of the Russian manufactories is almost exclusively for home consumption, the manufacturer has his eye chiefly on the quantity, and not so much on the quality, of the article produced; his object being to get a ready market for his goods, and a reasonable profit: and as the most considerable demand for his wares arises from the lower and middle classes, they must correspond in quality and price with the habits and resources of his customers. The wants of the higher ranks are chiefly supplied from foreign markets; for their fashions and habits are altogether exotic, and do not correspond with the general state of culture in the other classes of the inhabitants.

The whole number of manufactories, small and great, throughout the empire, is stated to be about 5500, with about 200,000 workmen. In the different cloth manufactories, belonging to the crown and to private individuals, about 35,000 workmen are employed; and they produce about 2,800,000 arsheens* of common cloth of different qualities, which is mostly used by the common people, and for clothing the military. But so very disproportionate are the supplies from the Russian cloth manufactories to the actual consumption, that cloth of different qualities, but especially fine cloth, is imported from foreign countries, to a great amount annually. clothes of the nobility, officers, and merchants, are mostly all made of foreign cloth. Large supplies of Saxon cloth, and of the finer sorts manufactured in Russia, are required for the Chinese market.

In the government of Moscow, and in some parts of the south of Russia, there are several small manufactories of silk, in which about 6000 persons are supposed to be employed. That belonging to Prince Iusupoff, near Moscow, used to be most renowned. They manufacture silk and cotton stuffs, taffetas, handkerchiefs, &c.; but in no respect are these to be compared with similar productions of Florence, France, and England. They are chiefly dependent on Persia and Turkey for the materials which they use; for the quantity of silk and cotton raised in the south of Russia is still very inconsiderable, there being not more than 700 poods † of silk produced annually.

The leather manufactories are about 1000 in number: they abound in the government of Nijnia-Novogorod. They manufacture leather annually to the amount of three millions of roubles, which forms an important article of internal commerce. Very tolerable red, green, and yellow saffian is made in Astrachan, by the Armenians; and black saffians in Kazan, by the Tartars.

There are also from 200 to 300 linen manufactories, chiefly in the governments of Vladimir, Iaroslaff, and Kostroma, producing annually twenty millions of arsheens of different kinds of linen, sheeting, and sail-cloth, &c., which, to the amount of six millions of roubles, is yearly exported. But the home consumption is chiefly supplied by the domestic looms of the peasantry, who are still accustomed to manufacture their own russet-coats, linens, checks, &c.

There are about fifty rope manufactories: they prepare 350,000 poods, valued at a million and a half of roubles.

No manufactories in Russia have made such rapid advances towards perfection as those of plate and cut glass, of every quality. There are single plates made, at the Petersburg glass-works, so large and clean, that they cost 600l. sterling each. The glass-works of the Brothers Maltzoff, in the government of Tula and Twer, are deservedly renowned. The home consumption of this article is very great, and daily augmenting. The prices are low, in comparison with English glass-ware. The annual exports are still inconsiderable, not exceeding half a million of roubles.—The state of other branches of manufacture will be considered in the course of the work itself.

The commerce of the Russian empire has also advanced steadily with the other branches of national industry and aggrandisement. Archangel, though the oldest, is not the least important mart of commerce, even in the present day. The English have traded to this port since the year 1553; and of late years, the Americans strive to divide the trade with them. Archangel is most conveniently situated for receiving, by water communication, the articles of exportation from the eastern and middle parts of European Russia; and for transporting, by the same easy communication, the vast quantities of coffee, cotton, sugar, &c. consumed in the interior of the empire. The number of ships which annually visit this most northern port is about 250. The imports consist of coffee, cotton and cotton-yarn, indigo, cochineal, &c.: the exports are, flax, hemp, tallow, sheetings, and wood.

The ports on the Baltic are, Wyburg, Cronstadt, St. Petersburg, Narva, Revel, Baltic-Port, Pernau, Riga, Arnsburg, and Libau. The chief exports are, wood, corn, hemp, flax, tallow, linens, potashes, &c.; and the imports include nearly all kinds of colonial produce, and European manufactured goods.

The commerce with Persia by the Caspian Sea has of late years considerably increased. Astrachan is the principal mart for this traffic. The imports consist of raw cotton and silk, shawls, pearls, &c.; and the exports are cast-iron and copper articles, cloth, manufactured silks, &c. Of the commerce of the Black Sea we shall speak in the work itself. The land trade with China and the nations of Middle Asia is every year rising into greater importance. Kiachta is the place of barter betwixt the Russians and the Chinese. The latter bring tea, manufactured silks, nankeens, and cottons, to the market; and receive in return, furs, ticking, cloth, and leather. The trade of Russia with China is considered very lucrative.

Orenburg and Uffa are the two marts on the Orenburg frontier for trade with the Bucharians, Hivintsi, Kirgizi, &c. The exports and imports are said to amount to upwards of eight millions of roubles annually; and, through recent exploratory embassies to those countries from the Russian Government, commerce with the tribes of Middle Asia has been greatly extended.

The land traffic with the nations of Western Europe is principally carried on through the frontier towns of Polangen on the Prussian, Redzivilof on the Austrian, and Doubassar on the Turkish frontier.

In 1823, the whole imports by sea and land were valued at 158 millions of roubles, and the exports at 195 millions; on which the Government levied 40,586,743 roubles, in duties. But in 1830, the imports had risen to 192 millions, and the exports to 258 millions; on which 65,708,646 roubles of duties were paid. Official documents give the number of ships that had arrived in all the ports of Russia that year at 6128, and state the exports to have been the following: Grain, 3,628,210 tschetverts: Iron, 1,014,842 poods; Wax, 52,264 poods; Potash, 722,108 poods; Oil, 643,625 poods; Hemp, 2, 196,721 poods; Flax, 2,309,302 poods; Soap, 4,088,932 poods; Tobacco, 49,342 poods; Wood, exported for 8,263,553 roubles; Cattle, 8914 head; Hides, 304,404. In 1832, the exports exceeded the imports only about fifty millions of roubles, or two millions sterling.

The principal mint of the empire is in the Fortress of St. Petersburg, where gold and silver are coined.

There are also four mints in Siberia for copper. The issues of gold, silver, and copper money, from these five mints, during the last century, are estimated at 300 millions of roubles, of which there is reckoned still to be about 100 millions in circulation. They have also recently begun to use platina as a circulating medium, and in 1830 coined 337,000 roubles of this metal. Since the introduction of the paper currency, in 1768, the Government have issued above 600 millions of roubles in paper notes: but this paper, since it was first issued, has lost nearly 75 per cent. of its original value; so that four roubles in paper or copper are given for one silver rouble in common currency. quantity of paper in circulation is immense: probably its amount is not known; because forgery is carried on to a considerable extent in the interior, where the peasantry cannot so easily distinguish betwixt the forged notes and the real ones issued by the Government.

The revenue of the empire is small, in comparison to its extent and population. This arises from various causes; such as, the want of freedom, the low state of civilization, the small number of their manufactories, the unstable principles of the Government, the frequent changes in the tariffs, &c.

The revenue is principally drawn from the following sources: 1. The obrok, or capitation-tax, of three roubles upon every male peasant, which produces about seventy five millions. 2. The profits of the monopoly of brandy, which gives upwards of 100 millions. 3. The duties on imports and exports amounted in 1830 to about sixty-six millions. 4. The merchants pay about two per cent. upon their declared capital. 5. Foreign artisans pay for permission to exercise their trades: masters, 100 roubles; their assistants, forty; and each of their workmen, twenty roubles per annum. 6. A tax of forty kopecks (four-pence) per pood is laid upon salt, at the salt lakes, which produces a considerable sum. 7. A duty of six per cent. is paid to Government on all moveable and immoveable property which is disposed of by legal contract. 8. The Post-office produces a considerable revenue. 9. Artisans and citizens pay a tax of five roubles per head. 10. A tax upon passports, and Government orders for post-horses. 11. Stamp duties, &c. &c.

These are the principal sources of the revenue of the Russian empire, which amounts in the present day to upwards of 450 millions of roubles, paper currency, or 18,000,000*l*. sterling. The expenditure is generally in proportion to the income. When less, they endeavour, with the overplus, to pay off the foreign debts, or lessen the quantity of the paper currency: when more, they contract new debts, lay on new taxes, or add to the paper currency.

To these few observations and statistical sketches much might be added, by way of comment: for the present state of the Russian empire affords rich materials for those who study the reciprocal interests of the European States. Russia has not yet reached the maturity of her strength: remain stationary she cannot: and who is able to predict her future greatness, or to tell how far her limits may yet extend? Had Russia a revenue equal to that of England, her armies, under an enterprising spirit like Peter the Great, might soon overrun a great part of Europe. How desirable is it, therefore, that education and the pure principles of the Gospel should extend their influence among the nations of that mighty empire; so that this colossal power, raised up by the Almighty in these latter days to fulfil His inscrutable decrees—raised up from the descendants of those very tribes that once overturned the Roman empire in the meridian of its civilization, and which has now assumed such a commanding position on the frontiers of the nations of Europe and Asia—may become the minister of peace and happiness, and not of desolation and thraldom, to the human race!

When a foreigner arrives in St. Petersburg for the first time, he is forcibly struck with two things—the magnificence of the city, and the high degree of civilization of its inhabitants, contrasted with the wild natural state in which the greater part of the country around it still lies, and the rude uncultivated appearance of the natives. He is astonished at the high state of discipline of the troops; the extensive marine establishments of Cronstadt and Petersburg; the vigour and despatch which seem to characterize the movements of every one that passes by in the uniform of the Government; the palaces of the Imperial family; the public gardens and promenades; the churches and public buildings; the sumptuous dwellings of the nobles and foreign merchants; the great bazaar in the midst of the city, filled with the products of European and Asiatic industry; the beautiful canals, lined with granite, crowned with numerous bridges, and filled with barks laden with the produce of the interior; the branches of the river around the Exchange covered with vessels from foreign ports; the villas and gardens on the small islands formed by the mouths of the Neva; the splendid reviews, public fêtes, and the various national costumes of the inhabitants—all combine to heighten his astonishment and delight: and it may truly be affirmed, that such extensive inroads on the rudeness of nature, by which the morasses and wilds of the banks of the Neva have been transformed in a single century into the most splendid city in Europe, could only have been produced by the resources of a great empire, at the command of an absolute monarch. No constitutional government, to which is entrusted the welfare of a free people, could reasonably have commanded means adequate to such an undertaking, in so short a time. The grandeur and luxury of ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates, compared with its present state of desolation, may afford a fit idea of the swamps and thickets on the Neva in 1703, and the splendid metropolis of Russia which now occupies their place in 1833: and it is only with the disposable forces of a nation like that of the ancient Nebuchadnezzars that the Tzars of Russia have been able to call into existence such a noble city in so short a time.

But St. Petersburg is not a fair specimen of Russia: its inhabitants are mostly foreigners, either in their origin or in their manners. No class of the Russians, except the very lowest, is to be viewed here in their native state. We shall not therefore take, as the basis of a description of the Russians, the incorrect specimen of them which Petersburg affords; but examine the condition of the peasantry in the villages, and that of the other classes in the provincial towns.

Before my departure from St. Petersburg, Prince

Galitzin very kindly supplied me with letters of recommendation to the most distinguished individuals, both ecclesiastical and civil, in the different provinces of the empire which I purposed visiting; and the late Minister of the Interior, Kozadavleff, afforded me similar facilities for my journey, and especially a general order to all the postmasters to procure me horses without delay, that I might not be exposed to the disagreeable altercations which so frequently take place betwixt the traveller and the postmasters, or the postillions, at the stations in the interior.

I travelled in an open calash, with a young Russian for a servant.—The number of versts* from principal places are marked upon black-and-white painted wooden posts, about ten feet high, along all the principal roads; and at every station, the podorojnia, or Government order for post-horses, is copied into a book. The peasantry of the villages where there are post-stations furnish the horses, and each drives his own. They are called Yamstchiki; and are paid a certain sum for each horse, and a remuneration by the traveller, according as he is satisfied with their services; which is styled Na Vodka, "for brandy." The rate of fares paid for posting is very low, in comparison with that of other European States; not above five-pence per English mile, for three horses. The horses and harness, with the driver, in his long beard, broad-brimmed hat, and long sheep-skin coat bound round the waist with a girdle, large gloves, and whip in hand, is a perfect contrast to English, French, or even German postillions. Persons of rank travel in their own carriages, of European construction; but the Government couriers travel in telegas, or four-wheeled simplyconstructed carts, with a bundle or two of hay or straw thrown into them, to sit or lie upon. When a semicircular head is put upon the hind part of this vehicle, it is then called a kibitka, and looks exactly like a large cradle placed upon four wheels. In inclement weather, two or three bass-mats sewed together, and bound fast to the fore-part of the head, are made to fall over the open part of the carriage, so as to protect the The Russian postillions always yoke their traveller. horses abreast of each other; so that they drive sometimes four, five, or six in hand, all running by the side of each other; and, like the ancient Grecian charioteers. they are extremely skilful in managing them. Three post-horses are generally yoked to a light carriage with two persons in it: to heavy carriages they yoke six horses abreast, and then two in front of the middle horses, with a boy, as postillion, riding the right-hand horse.

The first place of importance we passed through, on leaving the capital, was Gatchina, a small town about forty versts from Petersburg, famous as the residence of the Emperor Paul, when Grand-duke. It was originally built by Prince Gregory Orlof; and after his death was purchased, with all the peasantry in the neighbourhood, by the Empress Catherine II. She appointed it for the usual residence of her son, Paul Petrovitch; who passed the greater part of his time there, in exercising a few companies of soldiers, instead of preparing himself, in the political school of Catherine, in St. Petersburg, for the government of this mighty empire. Many individuals of penetration in Russia attribute the disasters of his reign to this total neglect of his education by his mother, and the mortifications he had to endure, under her jealousy, for forty-two years before he came to the throne. When emperor, Gatchina still remained one of his favourite places of resort. The palace is of a moderate size; the gardens, laid out in the English style, are extensive and beautiful; and it was long the summer residence of his widow, the Dowager Empress Maria Federovna*. The Emperor Paul erected Gatchina into a town, by an ukaz, in 1797. There are about 3000 inhabitants, who principally subsist by agriculture, and the employment afforded them from the palace. In the church of Gatchina the emperor deposited the reliques of the Order of the Knights of Malta, presented by Baron Hompech, on his becoming Grand Master of the Order, in 1799; consisting of a bit of the true Cross, the right hand of John the Baptist, and the wonder-working image of Nôtre Dame de Filerme, which are said to have been transported from Rhodes to Malta in 1523, and were brought from Malta to Petersburg in 1798!

The country from Gatchina to Pleskof is level, and presents no scenery to interest the traveller: a great part of it is still covered with extensive forests of fir and birch, quite in a state of nature; the rest is devoted to agriculture and grazing. The villages of the peasantry, as in other parts of the empire, are all built of blockwood, and covered with shingles or straw: they are nearly in the same style in every part of Russia, the gable end always turned to the road. Each hut has its own gate; leading into a court, from which is the entrance into the dwelling. The stables, sheds, and other out-houses, compose the remaining sides of the court; so that the gate being generally shut, each family lives undisturbed within its own enclosures. But in consequence of the whole establishment being built of wood and other inflammable materials, and the excessive heat in summer, burnt-down villages, alas! meet the eye of the traveller too frequently in the interior. In such circumstances, should the proprietor of the serfs be unable or unwilling to aid them in procuring materials for new huts, they divide into parties, and go about the towns and villages to collect money for this purpose by begging.

On entering the cottage, a large oven, built of brick, from six to eight feet square, five feet high, and level on the top, is always seen occupying a prominent part in the dwelling. Part of the family always sleep upon the top of it in the winter season; for regular bedsteads are not yet in general use among them. They spread down their mats and sheep-skin coats in any place that best suits them, in summer very frequently in an outhouse or in the open air. A common fir table, near to the small glazed or unglazed window; benches placed along the sides of the apartment; a few earthen pots, in which the food is cooked in the oven (for they have no other fire-place for cooking); some wooden trenchers; a salt-box, and spoons made of the same material; a wooden vessel or two, for holding water; a trough cut out of the trunk of a tree, in which to wash their linen; with a chest to hold their clothesthese simple articles compose the whole amount of the furniture of a Russian izba or cottage. The poorest hut, however, is always supplied with one or more small pictures of their tutelary saints: sometimes, also, among the more wealthy, one observes the pictures of the Saviour and the Virgin; and not a few possess a representation of the Holy Trinity—the Father appearing seated on a throne as the Ancient of Days, the Son on the one side, and the Holy Spirit, in the form of a dove, on the other. These small pictures are hung up in the corner of the hut, facing the door; so that they catch the eye of every one who enters, and remind him of his duty. The stranger having passed the threshold, and shut the door behind him, stands mute, bows before them, crosses himself several times, repeats a few words of ejaculation, and then, and not till then, turns to the inhabitants of the hut, with the salutation of "Peace be with you!" "Jesus Christ be with you!" and after this, he states the errand on which he comes.

To supply the peasantry with sacred pictures, that are generally painted upon wooden boards, and crosses, old men travel about the country bareheaded, and barter or exchange them; for, according to their ideas of their sanctity, no price can be put upon them, and therefore they are never sold. Nor are they ever burnt or destroyed: when too old for use, the sacred picture is given in charge to a running stream, which carries it away from the view of its former possessor; and whosoever finds it, returns it again to the waters, until it is seen no more.

In the huts of the common people, the sacred corner, which is considered the family altar, and where, on a small shelf before the pictures, the Bible, in many of them, of late years, has found a place, is the only part of the dwelling in which any symptoms of the arts of civilization are to be discovered; namely, in the pictures of the saints, neatly framed, and sometimes plated with silver and gilt: for there is scarcely another article to be observed in the hut, but such as belong to the manufacture of the very rudest state of human society: and how lamentable it is to find that this sacred corner, this family altar, should so often, to the rude and ignorant peasantry, few of whom are able to read, be little better than a temple of idols! Alas! they know no better. But when I had the gratification of beholding the Bible on the wooden support in the presence of the group of painted figures, and found the inmates anxiously inquiring after its contents, with one in their number who could read, I considered that the true antidote to the evil was provided.

Con arriving in Pleskof, anciently called Plescovia, we had to wind through the streets, among extensive ruins of houses and churches, till we procured a lodging at an inn kept by an Italian. After a little repose, I called upon the Civil Governor of the province, Von Aderkass, an active clever little German, who, on reading my credentials, afforded me every facility in his power to attain the object of my visit to Pleskof. In the afternoon, I drove, with the governor, to the residence of the Archbishop Eugenius, at about five versts distance from the city, who expressed his happiness at seeing me again. His eminence was then about fifty-six years of age, a man of very considerable literary attainments, and fond of discussions of that kind. In regard to the proper object of my mission, he informed me, that, since my previous visit, a Bible Society had been formed for the diocese of Pleskof-that they had still been unable to obtain copies of the Scriptures in proportion to the demands made for them; for that the greater part of the clergy, belonging to the 450 parishes of his diocese, were still destitute of the Bible—that the 500 Bibles and 261 Testaments which they had received from St. Petersburg were already disposed of; and even a second supply of 500 Bibles and 700 Testaments, ordered, were nearly all bespoken. The population of the diocese he stated at about 650,000; among whom they had collected 13,000 roubles (520*l*.) the first year, in support of the society.

His eminence shewed me a few sheets of a work he is publishing in St. Petersburg, on the Lives, and more especially the Writings, of the most eminent Authors among the Russian Clergy, from the earliest ages; treating not merely of such of their writings as have been published, but of the numerous manuscripts still preserved in monasteries and libraries throughout the empire. I have since obtained a copy of this work; and find in it much that is new; and not without value, as bearing upon the state of Christianity in Russia from the time of its introduction in the tenth century, till the civilized nations of Europe became more intimately acquainted with that country and its inhabitants in the last century.

The archbishop also mentioned to me, that he was employed in writing the History of Pleskof: but he complained much of a want of materials, notwithstanding that he had made diligent search after them in the ecclesiastical libraries of Novogorod, and other places where records of ancient times are preserved. The monastery in which his eminence resides is quite retired, near the banks of the River Velikaia. The furniture of his apartments is of the plainest kind; and, seemingly, he is attended only by a few monks and servants of the church.

After partaking of tea—a general beverage among the Russian clergy, which is usually of the best kind, and served up without milk, but with lemon-juice or brandy—we drove in company to the top of a neighbouring hill, where we had a charming view of the ancient city and environs of Plescovia, and of the extensive lake of the same name; and it was both instructive and agreeable to listen to the remarks of the aged prelate upon the surrounding scene, with the history of which, since the earliest ages, his pen was then occupied.

Pleskoff is situated on the banks of the Velikaia and Plescova; and was built by the famous Russian princess Olga, who was born in a village about eight miles distant from it, named Sibout, whence the young prince Igor espoused her for his wife. But her love to her native place was so strong, that after she had become a Christian, about the year 965, she came from Kief to propagate the Christian Religion among its heathen inhabitants; and at that time, as the legend goes, founded the city, on the spot indicated to her by a supernatural light from Heaven, which descended upon a certain place on the banks of the two above-mentioned streams. She began by erecting a church in honour of the Holy Trinity; and the city arose around it, and became distinguished for its power and commercial importance, through many succeeding ages.

When the famous Vladimir the First divided his kingdom among his ten children, whom he had by an equal number of wives, Pleskoff fell to the lot of Soudislav, who became in consequence its first sovereign, about the year 1030. But the fate and even government of Pleskoff was in general intimately connected with that of its rival and elder sister, Novogorod, until its union with the Hanseatic towns, about the beginning of the fifteenth century, at which time they began to coin silver money at Pleskoff. This coin had the head of an ox, with a crown below it; and on the reverse, the value marked. Republican principles prevailed in Pleskoff till it was subdued by the Grand-duke Ioan Vasillivitch, 1509. The Russian chronologer, Nestor, says, that the Christian Religion was propagated as early in the regions of Pleskoff as in Novogorod, by St. Joachim the Chersonite.

The present city is in a most dilapidated and ruined condition, with about 10,000 inhabitants. It is still divided into three parts—the Kremlin, the central city, and the great city. The towers and fortifications of the outer wall occupy a circle of about seven versts: these are all of limestone; and are so reduced by the effects of the frosts in winter and heats in summer, that certainly a few ages more will cover the mouldering heaps with green turf. The governor is breaking down the massive inner walls which divided the three quarters of the city, and improving the streets with the stone and rubbish: he is also using great exertions to repair the public buildings, which are mostly in a neglected and decayed state.

How frequently is the traveller in Russia surprised at the appearance of groups of once splendid public buildings, now deserted and crumbling under the effects of the seasons—monuments of the despotic will of the sovereign or of some territorial lord, who commanded a city to rise here and a palace yonder! The walls arose; but the minds of men move not always in unison with the royal will, where commercial interests are at stake.

This remark, however, does not apply to Pleskoff; because these massive buildings were produced in former ages, by the necessities of a crowded city of enterprising merchants, enriched by the gains of an extensive and successful trade. The governor has also laid a floating bridge over the Velikaia, and is erecting an arched wooden bridge over the Plescova. Provided these improvements are carried on a few years longer, the city will assume a more inviting appearance, especially if a canal is dug betwixt the Peipus Lake and Pernau on the Baltic, as now contemplated.

The churches were formerly very numerous: they are now reduced to thirty; but many of them are still in such a state, that the governor informs me he intends to pull down at least one third of them, in which divine service is no longer performed. The number of arched caves and vaults within the walls is quite extraordinary. The ancient inhabitants seem to have had every part of this extensive city connected by secret subterranean passages.

I went to see the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, in the Kremlin; where I found the archbishop officiating, amidst a crowd of worshippers, on occasion of the annual procession of one of their sacred pictures, denominated "The Virgin of Pestschera" (the Virgin of the Cave). The cathedral is rich, in sacerdotal garments, sacred vases, &c. &c., and possesses the reliques of several of their saints, especially of St. Timothy, who, as a heathen prince, was named Domant, and was the most famous of the ancient Plescovian warriors. The archbishop now occupies the palace of the Princes of Pleskof; in which also is the Consistory, where the ecclesiastical business of the diocese is transacted. The public edifices are of brick; but most of the private dwellings are of blockwood.

After the mass was over, the whole clergy, except the archbishop, with a great concourse of the inhabitants dressed in their best clothes, carried the sacred picture above mentioned, in solemn procession, amidst loud psalmody and the ringing of bells, around the outer wall of the city. It was a truly humbling spectacle, to behold thousands of the ignorant and superstitious inhabitants of this city and neighbourhood crossing and prostrating themselves before a black ugly female portrait, as it passed by, decked out with gold and gems! What but the light of divine revelation can dispel this heathenish darkness, and point out to the inhabitants of modern Plescovia the only object of worship, and the only Mediator betwixt God and man! This image of the Virgin is very old; and is here "on a visit for a few days," as they express it, collecting money for the monastery to which she belongs.

The lower orders of the clergy were seen among the crowd, pleading for "alms to the Queen of Heaven"!! Of what vast importance is it, then, to put the Bible into the hands of a people like this! for where it is unknown, or little known, spectacles like these must prevail: such has been the tendency of human nature, in all nations, and in all ages.

I have visited several of the principal merchants in the place, who take considerable interest in the cause of our society.—In a terrace-garden belonging to one of them, within the walls, I observed a very ingenious method of preserving fruit-trees of a delicate kind from the severity of the winter in this northern region. The trees were growing freely in the ground, and bearing a fair appearance for a good crop; but observing them all supported with stakes, I inquired the cause, and was informed that the roots of the trees were permitted to grow only on one side, which enabled the gardener, in autumn, to lay the trees down and cover them with straw and earth until spring, when they were again raised and staked, as I saw; that otherwise, these fruit-trees could not live in this severe climate.

The Company of Russian Merchants in Pleskof is still respectable; and they carry on a considerable trade in hemp, flax, tallow, hides, &c., with Narva, and other seaports on the Gulf of Finland.

In ancient times, the chief marts of commerce in Russia were Moscow, Vladimir, Kief, Novogorod, and Pleskoff. But the merchants did not then compose a distinct class of the inhabitants, as at the present day. In 1785, Catherine erected them into a separate body, divided them into three classes or guilds, and granted to them certain immunities and regulations calculated to facilitate commerce.

Merchants of the first class engage in general trade, both domestic and foreign; and have the privilege of erecting manufactories, building ships, and sending them to foreign countries with their merchandise.

Merchants of the second guild may also carry on wholesale trade, but only within the limits of the empire. They likewise may establish manufactories; and convey their produce, by land or water, to the cities and fairs in different parts of the country, for sale.

But merchants of the third guild have a right to trade only in the towns where they reside, and in the districts belonging to these towns; and to sell their wares exclusively in these, and in the villages and public markets belonging to the district. They are also permitted to carry on weaving, keep taverns, eating-houses, baths, and inns.

The body of merchants in the principal towns have a court of their own, the members and officers of which are chosen from among themselves. They bear the taxes and other burthens appointed by the monarch; but they are exempt from corporal punishment, and from furnishing recruits.

In 1807, the Emperor Alexander bestowed some signal marks of honour upon those of the first guild, called Pervostateinoi, from which class the city magistrates are chosen. These are permitted to drive with four horses, wear a sword by their side, and appear at court; but the two other guilds cannot drive with more than two horses in towns. For the merchants of the first guild there is a book of honour, named "The Velvet Book of distinguished Families of Merchants," in which the names of those who distinguish themselves are enrolled.

The domestic economy and dress of the merchants, especially of the second and third class, are generally still regulated by the customs of their forefathers; and it is among the Russian merchants of Moscow, Novogorod, Pleskoff, and Kief, that we are still enabled to judge of the ancient Russians in these respects. Many of the merchants are good-looking men, of middle stature, healthy, and inclined to be stout when past the prime of life. Among their wives and daughters, we not unfrequently meet with very handsome women, who, in advanced age, are also much disposed to become corpulent. Those of them who are in opulence lead a life of idleness and luxury, more in the style and manner of the Orientals than of society in Western Europe.

On days of public festivity, the merchants, and indeed the Russians of all classes, make great display in their wheeled carriages of different kinds. Riding on horse-back is little practised among the nobility, and very seldom by the merchant or peasant. When the latter has merely to pass from village to village, at a few versts distance, the teleshka or four-wheeled car must be yoked for the purpose, in summer, and the sanka or sledge in winter; for not one in fifty, who possess these conveniences, would ever think of performing the journey on horseback or on foot, unless necessity compelled him to it.

Both sledges and cars are of the very simplest workmanship; in the construction of which, in general, not a single nail is employed. Wooden pegs and withies bind the different parts together; and the whole equipage is quite in accordance with the harness of their horses and their own dress—all the production of that natural power of invention, which applies itself to all trades, and over which the corporations and guilds of cities have no controul. Indeed, every peasant is carpenter, carmaker, saddler, shoemaker, &c. &c. to his own family; and his wife supplies the place of weaver (both of linen and woollen clothes), dyer, and tailor, in her department of the household labour.

In former times, the nobles also rode in equipages little differing from those now in use among the lower orders; and it is only since the middle of the last century that coaches, chariots, calashes, gigs, droshkas, &c., were introduced among the nobles of Russia. But in the present day, sumptuous carriages abound in the streets of the two capitals. On the First of May 1811, on the festival which introduces the spring, I witnessed upwards of 3000 coaches and chariots, most of them with four, and many of them with six horses, on the great promenade between the Sakolnik and the city of Moscow. The nobility endeavour to outshine each other, on these occasions, in the splendor of their equipages, in the beauty of their horses, and sumptuousness of their liveries; and as the great festival-days in the Russian Kalendar are still numerous, notwithstanding the deductions which have been made from them within the last century, there is no want of opportunities for display. But very few, comparatively, appear on horseback on such days: they prefer to be seated in an open landau or chariot, and to view at their ease the extensive line of equipages moving on, at a gentle pace, alongside of them.

On the First of May the ladies of rank lay aside their winter furs; and appear in the newest fashions, imported from the capital of France for the summer months: for Paris is the regulator of dress, in the higher circles, on the banks of the Neva and Moskva, as well as on those The wives of the Russian of the Danube and Thames. merchants are likewise seen in their calashes, and on their droshkas, at all such public festivals. But their dresses still remain quite national, and peculiarly interest the stranger; and though, like the leaves upon the trees, they are of the same shape and colour one Mayday with another, yet the richness of their hues, and costliness of the silk stuffs and brocades, of which they are made, render them even more sumptuous than those worn by the nobles. The grand points of competition among the Russian merchants, on such days of display, consist in the beauty of their horses, and the rich attire of their wives. An incredible value in pearls and precious stones is worn on the head and neck dresses of the females belonging to the higher class of the Russian merchants: the wives of those whose circumstances are not affluent adorn themselves in mock jems, in a similar way. To see an aged, grey-bearded Russian merchant dressed in a plain flowing robe of fine broad cloth, without a collar to his shirt or a cravat about his neck: with a silken girdle around his loins, and a rich fur cap on his head; seated beside his wife, dressed in substantial and gaudy-coloured silks and jewels as above described, with her cheeks and eyebrows, though by nature ever so fair, loaded with paint, red, white, and black; one is compelled to smile at the contrast. But on such days, even the poorest hawker of pies and pancakes, with his wife and daughters, endeavours to appear respectable at the Goulenia; for such is the name by which these popular festivals are known.

I was accompanied by the governor on a visit to the ostrog or principal gaol. It is situated in a retired part of the city; and is an oblong square building of stone, only one story high. The number of wards is eleven, five on one side of the house, and six on the other, having a common passage between them. cells were well aired and clean, the walls having been recently white-washed. In these eleven cells we found fifty-eight criminals, classified according to the nature of their crimes. Of this number, eight were murderers; and most of the others were thieves, particularly horsestealers: some were deserters;—but there were no debtors. Their clothing is their own, or is given them by the benevolent inhabitants of the place, who frequently supply them with food also, especially on holidays. Their allowance from Government is fifteen kopicks, 11d. per day for each individual: the money, however, is not given to the prisoners, but laid out in the purchase of food by the keeper. Each receives two pounds of brown bread daily, and one half pound of meat twice a week. In some of the cells, the criminals had chains on their legs, with which they were secured at night; but so light, as not to prevent their walking about in the court with little difficulty. The floors being of stone or earth, and there being no bedding, but wooden benches only for them to lie upon, I spoke to the governor on the desirableness of having the cells floored; which he not only admitted, but assured me it was his intention to have it done before winter. I found no Bibles or religious books of any kind among them; but they were afterwards furnished with a few copies of the Scriptures. This prison is surrounded with a high stone wall, enclosing a spacious court, which was very clean; in one part of which there is a draw-well, and in another a bath-house, with other conveniences calculated to promote cleanliness among the prisoners. They are obliged to use the bath once every week. The governor says that divine service is performed among them regularly every Sunday. He also informed me, that, in the eight district prisons of the province, the number of criminals at present is from twenty to thirty in each;—that, in the whole of these prisons, there are at present no fewer than twenty-nine persons convicted of murder, an unusual proportion among a population of 650,000 souls.

We next visited the City Hospital, which occupies an airy spot on the banks of the Plescova. Cleanliness characterized the different wards; and even the sick criminals brought from the prison had a place appropriated to them, and seemed to be treated with great humanity. After dining with the governor, we went and spent the evening with the archbishop, who is certainly much fonder of antiquarian and historical researches than of theological discussion.

The country around Pleskoff is level, but far from being fruitful. Extensive clayey and sandy plains abound, where nothing seems to thrive but the common fir. In winter they have a most dreary aspect, and even in summer there is little that is inviting in the prospect: nevertheless, the province not only raises sufficient grain for the support of its own population, but also exports upwards of one million of tschetverts annually. The flax and hemp are of a superior quality; and there is abundance of wood and pasturage. A great quantity of leather is manufactured in this province, which finds a ready market at Petersburg, Narva, and other places.

Journey from Pleskoff to Polotsk, the principal seat of the Jesuits

After making the necessary preparations for continuing my journey, I went and dined at the archbishop's: and left Pleskoff in the afternoon, taking the road for Polotsk; which town I reached the following morning, having travelled all night. Polotsk was then the principal seat of the Jesuits. I happened to enter their elegant church in the morning; and found upwards of 200 young boys, · chiefly sons of the nobility in the surrounding country, upon their knees, on the stone-pavement of the church, at their devotions. By a late order of the Emperor. they had been prohibited from admitting any into their schools, except the children belonging to their own Church. This order was not issued, however, before the Russian Government had had sad proofs of the influence they had gained over the minds of many, both young and old, belonging to the Greek Communion. Among others, a nephew of Prince A. Galitzin, who was a boarder in their seminary in St. Petersburg, became a Catholic; and occasioned no small uneasiness both to his parents and uncle, by the fanatical opinions the Jesuits had succeeded in instilling into him.

Production of the second time, 1815, it was found, on examination, that a considerable number of ladies of rank had also imbibed from them sentiments equally unfavourable to the Greek In order, in some degree, to counteract these opinions, and bring back the stray sheep to the fold of the Mother Church, the present metropolitan of Moscow, Philaret, who was then Archimandrite, and Professor of Divinity in the Nevskoy Spiritual Academy, wrote a Comparison between the Doctrines of the Greek and Romish Churches, with Remarks; a copy of which he gave me in manuscript, with permission to publish it at any time I might think proper:—and, as it certainly throws very considerable light on a subject which is but imperfectly understood in my native country, and comes from the pen of such a distinguished dignitary of the Russian Church, I feel a pleasure in introducing it. I have endeavoured to give a faithful version of the original, which I still possess.

COMPARISON OF THE DIFFERENCES IN THE DOCTRINES OF FAITH BETWIXT THE EASTERN AND WESTERN CHURCHES.

THE spirit of the doctrines of Christianity is contained in the following words of Jesus Christ:—"This is life "eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus "Christ, whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3.

In the composition of this saving knowledge, we find,

- 1. The knowledge of the source from which we are to draw true faith; as it is only out of a pure source that we can derive pure doctrine.
- 11. The knowledge of God in Trinity; His eternal attributes; and His relation to this world.

- III. The doctrine of the corrupt state of human nature, without which it is impossible to feel our need of Jesus Christ as a Redeemer.
- IV. The doctrine of Jesus Christ as the Mediator betwixt God and man.
- v. The doctrine of the grace of the Holy Spirit and His influences, through which the redemption completed by Jesus Christ for all is imparted to every one who believes.
- vi. The doctrine of the Sacraments, by which grace is communicated and sealed.
- vII. The doctrine respecting the Church, as a society which should preserve the principles of faith and practice in reference to Christ.
- viii. The doctrine of a future state, in which the promises given us in Jesus Christ shall be fulfilled.

In these principal points, we must examine the doctrines of faith as held by different Churches: and the differences found regarding them ought to be deemed the more important, when any one, by contrary doctrines, attempts to darken the true and saving knowledge of God in Jesus Christ.

Opinions respecting Ceremonies may, on this occasion, be set aside; because, in Christianity, there are various opinions which may be received or rejected without either supporting or destroying the common faith: such, for instance, is the opinion respecting the existence of angels before the present world; supported by Chrysostom, and rejected by Theodorite. There are also ceremonies which may be different, not only in different Churches, but even in the same Church; such as that of the Greeko-Russian Church preferring immersion in baptism.

in accordance with the most ancient practice; but also tolerating sprinkling, as a ceremony which by no means destroys the power of this sacrament. And therefore, in order to shew the difference between the Eastern and Western Churches in the doctrine of faith, it will be necessary, 1st, to present the principal points in which they do not agree, according to the foregoing order; 2dly, to shew, to a certain extent, the grounds on which these positions rest; and, 3dly, to make such observations on the differences of opinion as may seem requisite.

The only pure and all-sufficient source of the doctrines of faith is the revealed word of God, contained now in the Holy Scriptures. "All Scripture is given by inspira-"tion of God; and is profitable for

- "doctrine, for reproof, for correc-"tion, for instruction in righteous-
- "ness, that the man of God may
- "be perfect, thoroughly furnished
- "unto all good works."—2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

Holy Scripture is not an adequate source of saving doctrine; for in Christianity there is much necessary to be known which is not in the Scriptures; as, for instance, that the Feast of Easter should b kept on a Sunday, &c.

REMARK.—This doctrine respecting the insufficiency of the Holy Scriptures is evidently intended to give greater importance to human traditions. But as there is no article of faith which is not revealed in "the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation," 2 Tim. iii. 15, therefore its silence respecting any tradition proves that it is no article of faith.

IL.

The Holy Scriptures are contained in the 39 Canonical Books of the Old, and 27 of the New Testament, which serve as a rule of faith; but the Third and Fourth * Books of Esdras, the Books of Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, the Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach, Baruch, and the three Books of Maccabees, together with certain other additions to several of the Books of the Old Testament, though respected by the Church for their antiquity and the sound doctrine found in them, are only esteemed by her to be Apocryphal; that is, Books, the divine origin of which is hid from our faith, or is subject to doubt: because the Old-Testament Church and Christian Churches never acknowledged them to be Canonical. II.

The Books of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach, Baruch, and two Books of Maccabees, like the other Books contained in the Bible, are Canonical; because the Church acknowledges them to be such.

REMARK.—And even the ancient Romish Church, according to the testimony of Jerome, made a distinction betwixt the Canonical and the Uncanonical Books: therefore the undoubted testimony now-a-days, respecting their divinity, is a partial and novel opinion.

III.

Every thing necessary to salvation is stated in the Holy Scriptures with such clearness, that every one, III.

Holy Scripture is so unintelligible, that it is impossible to understand it without an interpreter;

* In the Slavonian Bible, the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are called the I. and II. Books of Esdras.

reading it with a sincere desire to be enlightened, can understand it. "Thy word is a lamp unto my "feet, and a light unto my path:" Psalm exix. 105. "But if our Go-"spel be hid, it is hid to them that "are lost:" 2 Cor. iv. 3.

for many passages of it admit of various interpretations, &c.

REMARK.—An enlightened interpreter of Holy Scripture is doubtless very desirable for Christians less instructed; but the idea, that, in order to draw from it the articles of faith, a certain kind of despotic interpreter is necessary, lowers the dignity of the word of God, and subjects faith to the will of man.

IV.

The most authentic texts of the Holy Scripture are contained principally † in the Hebrew and Greek Originals; for all translations receive their credibility from the originals.

IV.

Sacred Scripture, in its original tongues, is adulterated; and the Latin translation of it, known by the name of the Vulgate, is the most authentic; because from ancient times it has been received by the Romish Church, and established by the Council of Trent.

REMARK.—The text of the Vulgate was acknowledged by the Council of Trent as the most authentic; for this, among other reasons, that the Clergy might not have need to learn the Hebrew and Greek languages. Sarp. Hist. Conc. Trid. 1.11. But this decision of the Council ought not to be received, because it hinders the needful and useful searching of the Scriptures: John V. 39.

V.

Every one has not only a right, but it is his bounden duty to read the Holy Scriptures in a language which he understands, and edify himself thereby. "Blessed is the "man who meditates in the law of "the Lord day and night:" Ps. i. 2. "Let the word of Christ dwell in "you richly in all wisdom, teaching "and admonishing one another:" Col. iii. 16. And the most of the Apostolical Epistles were written to the people, and not to the Clerical order alone.

Remark.—This principle of the Romish Church, under the pretence of precaution against error, shuts up the most hopeful way to soundness in the faith. However, in the present day, many of the Romanists do not strictly attend to this rule.

VI.

Holy Scripture being the word of God Himself, is the only supreme judge of controversies, and the decider of misunderstandings in matters of faith. "For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart:" Heb. iv. 12.

VI.

The Pope of Rome is the supreme and infallible judge of controversies and decider of misunderstandings in matters of faith: because he inherits all the privileges of the High Priest of the Old Testament, and of the Apostle Peter, for whom Jesus Christ himself prays, that his faith might not fail.—Luke xxii. 32.

REMARK.—As an infallible judge in matters of faith would render the Holy Scriptures unnecessary, so this infallibility, even if granted to any one, would be rendered unnecessary by the Holy Scriptures. However, even in the Romish Church itself, this infallibility is a matter of dispute.

VII.

The decisions of Councils are to be tried by the Holy Scriptures; so that no Council whatever can set up an article of faith which cannot be proved from the Holy Scriptures. This rule was always held by the ancient Church.

Councils have an equal degree of exemption from error with the Holy Scriptures; for in them Jesus Christ is present. "Where two or "three are gathered together in My "name, there am I in the midst of "them:" Matt. xviii. 20.

REMARK.—Jesus Christ only, as the searcher of hearts, knows which assembly is truly met in His name; for we can only judge of them by the revealed word of God. Without this precaution, we might be subjected to the decisions of such Councils as, under the name of Christianity, might impose upon us will-worship and absolute rule.

VIII.

The traditions of the Church are to be tried by the Holy Scriptures; and traditions respecting articles of faith, which are not to be found in them, ought not to be received: for the Holy Scriptures, in many places, forbid the adding of any thing whatsoever to the doctrines contained in them. Prov. xxx. 56. Gal. i. 8, 9. Acts xxii. 18.

VIII.

Unwritten traditions ought to be received with the same reverence as the written word of God; and may contain articles of faith necessary to salvation. "Hold the tra-"ditions which ye have been taught, "whether by word or our epistle:" 2 Thess. ii. 15.

REMARK.—The doctrines of Christianity were propagated at first by tradition and the written word unitedly, so long as the Apostles were upon the earth; and the writings necessary for preserving them, viz. the Books of the New Testament, were gradually completed. But were the Church, which has received a general and adequate rule of faith, Phil. iii. 16, to admit this unwritten word of God as of equal power in the government of the Church with the written word, this would be to run the risk of setting aside the commandments of God for the traditions of men. Matth. xx. 6.

OF GOD.

IX.

The Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father. "But when the Com-"forter is come, whom I will send "unto you from the Father, even the "Spirit of Truth, which proceedeth from the Father, He shall testify of me:" John xv. 26. IX.

The Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son. "All "things that the Father hath are "mine: therefore said I, that He "shall take of mine, and shall shew "it unto you:" John xvi. 15.

REMARK.—The words of Jesus Christ, "All things that the Father hath are mine," are of the same import with the following: "All mine are thine, and thine are mine:" John xvii.10. Most evidently they refer to the general attributes and operations of the Godhead; but not to the special attributes of each hypostasis of the Holy Trinity. The words, "He shall take of mine," when compared with the following, "And shall shew it unto you," signify that the Holy Spirit would instruct believers in the same truths that had been revealed to them in Jesus Christ: therefore these words do not prove the procession of the Holy Ghost. The words, "I will send," also do not belong to the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost; because "to send" cannot signify "to give beginning of being." But, in contrast with this, the inserted words, "which proceedeth from the Father," so clearly point out the eternal beginning of the hypostasis of the Holy Ghost, that no doubt is left upon it. And by the Second General Council, held in Constantinople in 381, against Macedonius, these very words are used in the symbol of faith, in order to express the article respecting the Holy Spirit; viz. "And in the Holy Ghost, the life-giving Lord, which proceedeth from the Father." And thus also we read in the Creed of the Romish Church, up to the ninth century: and when it was proposed to Pope Leo III. to insert in the Creed the new opinion respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, he not only refused to agree to it, but he commanded the Creed to be engraven, in Greek and Latin, on two silver tables, without the additional words "and the Son:" and he put the following superscription upon them: LEO FOUNDED THESE, OUT OF LOVE TO, AND FOR THE PRESERVATION OF. THE ORTHODOX FAITH. But still, notwithstanding this precaution, that addition, without any lawful examination in a General Council, has been propagated in the Western Church. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, exposed the same, in a Circular Epistle to the Patriarchs and Bishops in 866; and in the year 880, the Council of Constantinople, in which the Pope's Legates were present, in opposition to this same opinion, decreed, "that nothing should be changed in the Creed." similar decree had also before that been passed by the Third General Council at Ephesus. Nevertheless, the Popes of this time took the new dogma under their protection; and thus it became a principal barrier, even until now, or division betwixt the Western and Eastern Churches.

ON THE CORRUPTION OF HUMAN NATURE

Man, in his natural corrupt state, has liberty in the choice of natural, civil, and moral good; but for spiritual and saving operations, he has no free-will and power. "The "imagination of man's heart is evil "from his youth:" Gen. viii. 21. "Whosoever committeth sin, is the "servant of sin:" John viii. 34.

X.

Man, after the Fall, still retains so much natural power, that he can perform saving works, co-operate with grace, and in a certain sense merit it. For when God gives to us His Commandments, this naturally supposes that we are able to fulfil them.

REMARK.—The Law is proclaimed to man in order that he might know through it his own weakness, and unconditionally give himself up to grace. "The Law was our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ:" Gal. iii. 24,

XI.

Evil desires, or the first efforts of the will to sin, is a sin meriting God's wrath. In the 8th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, the whole of which refers to this subject, evil desires are repeatedly denominated sin; and among other things, it is proved, that it is forbid by the Law:—"Thou shalt not covet."

XI.

Evil desire is not sin: it only begets sin: James i. 15.

REMARK.—Evil desires beget actual sin, they being the very source of sin. An opposite opinion does not promote the purity of Christian morality.

CONCERNING A MEDIATOR.

XII.

The sufferings and death of Jesus Christ are an abundant satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. "Christ loved the Church, and gave "Himself for it, that he might sanc"tify and cleanse it; that he might "present it to himself a glorious "Church, not having spot or wrin"kle, or any such thing: "Eph. V. 25, 26, 27.

XII.

Though Jesus Christ has satisfied the justice of God, for our sins, yet we ought to merit an interest in this satisfaction, by making satisfaction ourselves: because we ought to be conformed to his image: Rom. viii. 29.

REMARK.—We ought to be conformed to the image of Christ, in love, meekness, benevolence, and patience; but we cannot imitate Him in his personal acts of redemption, such as making atonement for sin. To speak of our making satisfaction, is to lessen the value of His merits.

CONCERNING GRACE.

XIII.

Grace justifies through the power of the merits of Jesus Christ, which a man receives by living faith: good works are the fruits of faith and grace, and therefore they do not constitute in man any kind of personal merit: "For all have " sinned, and come short of the glory " of God: being justified freely by "his grace, through the redemption "that is in Christ Jesus; whom God "hath set forth to be a propitiation, "through faith in his blood.... "Therefore we conclude that a man "is justified by faith, without the "deeds of the Law:" Rom. iii. 23 -28. "When ye shall have done "all those things which are com-" manded you, say, We are unpro-"fitable servants:" Luke xvii. 10. To this subject also belong the whole Epistles to the Romans and

XIII.

Grace and faith only lay the beginning of the work of justification: a man acquires perfect justification, and eternal life, by his own merits, which are his good works. "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had "offered Isaac his son upon the "altar?.....See, then, how faith "wrought with his works, and by "works was faith made perfect:" James ii. 21, 22.

Remark.—Justification by faith, being a mystery of grace, was perversely understood by certain fleshly-minded men, even in the days of the Apostles. They wished to remain satisfied with a cold abstract kind of faith; and thought, that as it redeems them from condemnation on account of their iniquities, so also it frees them from the necessity of walking according to the Law of God. It is this barren, dead, false faith which the Apostle James condemns; and, by the example of Abraham, shews that the true faith that justifieth, "by works is made perfect." Otherwise, he shews justification in faith and works like the life in the root and fruit of the tree: so faith represents the root of justification. This idea is very clearly traced in his words immediately following those above quoted: "Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." The present difference of opinion between the Eastern and Western Churches on this subject refers more to the abstract principle than to active Christianity; because they are both agreed as to the obligation to good works: but those who find merit in their good works stand on Pharisaical ground.

CONCERNING THE SACRAMENTS.

XIV.

All Christians ought to communicate in the body and blood of Jesus Christ, under the symbols of bread and wine. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of "Christ? the bread which we break, "is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. x. 16.—"Drink ye all of it:" Matt. xvi. 27.

XIV.

The priests only ought to communicate in the eucharist in the two symbols of bread and wine; and the people in the one symbol of bread, because the strength of the sacrament is as well to be found in the one symbol as in both: and in order the more conveniently to partake of it, the Church abridges it into one symbol.

Remark.—If one symbol in this sacrament had been sufficient, and the other unnecessary, the Saviour would not have instituted it in two kinds. The first inventors of the communion in one kind were the Manicheans, whom Pope Gelasius, in the end of the fifth century, condemned by an interdict. But in the beginning of the fifteenth, the Council of Florence, which the Roman Church reckons the Seventeenth General Council, interdicted the communion in both kinds.

XV.

The clerical office is consistent with the married state; that is, he who has entered honourably into the married state may be a priest. Thus Paul writes to Titus: "Ordain "elders in every city, as I had "appointed thee; if any be blame-"less, the husband of one wife."

XV.

Priests ought to be unmarried—
"For a bishop must be tem"perate:" Titus i. 8.

Remark.—Though the Eastern Church has made it a rule that those who are entrusted with the higher degrees of spiritual power should be unencumbered with the duties of the married state and of a family, in order that they might completely and unreservedly devote themselves to the service of the Church—because "he that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife," 1 Cor. vii. 32, 33—nevertheless, she does not reckon celibacy absolutely necessary for all the ministers of the Church; because Christ himself has placed the restriction as only belonging to some: "He that is able to receive it, let him receive it:" Matt. xix. 11, 12. To separate the clergy from the married state, under the penalties of law, is to exalt one sacrament at the expense of another.

CONCERNING THE CHURCH.

XVI.

Jesus Christ is the only Head of the Church.—"And gave him to "be the Head over all things to the "Church; which is his body, the "fulness of Him that filleth all in "all:" Eph. i. 22, 23.

XVI.

Jesus Christ is the invisible, and the Pope of Rome the visible Head of the Church.—"Thou art Peter, "and upon this rock I will build "my Church:" Matt. xvi. 18.

These words refer to the bishop of Rome, as the successor of St. Peter.

REMARK.—The stone on which the Church is founded is not Peter himself, but the confession of faith boldly made by Peter—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God:" Matt. xvi. 16. Because another stable foundation of the Church "can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ:" 1 Col. iii. 11. If we are to call the instruments which the Lord is pleased (so to speak) to make use of in his own hand for the establishment and extension of his Church, the foundation of it, then, in this sense, it is built not merely upon Peter, but "upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone:" Eph. ii. 20.—and not upon the foundation of the bishops of Rome, who cannot stand in the same rank with the Apostles and Prophets. But the claim of the Romish bishop to be the successor of St. Peter is not so worthy of credit as the following, that the Antiochian apostle Paul, the Jerusalem apostle James, and even Peter himself, were all of them nothing more than "servants of Jesus Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God:" 1 Cor. iv. 1. Christ has no need of assistants; and the Church cannot have two heads: and as in no sense whatever is it ever termed the body of the bishop of Rome, but the body of Christ; therefore in no sense whatever can the bishop of Rome have any right to call himself its head.

XVII.

The spiritual power has under its charge matters relative to faith; and is subject to the genuine law of God's word, and the united Councils of the Church. For the spiritual power has in its hands the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and the right to bind and to loose on earth what ought to be bound or loosed in heaven: Matt. xvi. 19. xviii. 18. Those who use the keys of the spiritual power are subject to the decisions of the Church, which is bound to "try the spirits, whether they be of God:" I John iv. l.

XVII.

The Pope of Rome has the supreme power in all matters, spiritual and temporal, as the vicegerent of Jesus Christ.

REMARK.—At the end of the sixth century, Pope Gregory the Great wrote to the Emperor Maurice, "That he who calls himself, or suffers himself to be called, Universal Bishop, he, by his pride, becomes the Forerunner of Antichrist." But, in the ninth century, Pope Nicholas the Great wrote to the Emperor Michael, "That the civil power can neither justify nor condemn the Pope; because he has been called God by the pious emperor Constantine; and no man can take upon himself to judge God!" These contradictions shew sufficiently how one ought to judge of this supreme judge. The succeeding ages did shew, that in proportion as the Romish Church gained in worldly power, she lost in spirituality.

CONCERNING A FUTURE STATE.

XVIII.

The condition of a man's soul after death is fixed by his internal state; and there is no such thing as purgatory, in which souls have to pass through fiery torments, in order to prepare them for blessedness. "He that heareth my word, " and believeth on Him that sent " me, hath everlasting life, and shall " not come into condemnation; but " is passed from death unto life:" John v. 24. There is no need of any other kind of purification, when "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."

XVIII.

Betwixt heaven and hell there is purgatory, into which those who die in pardonable sins fall, and in which they are purified by fire, in order, afterwards, to enter bliss. "The day shall declare it; because "it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work, "of what sort it is. If any man's "work shall be burned, he shall "suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire:" 1 Cor. iii. 15.

Remark.—The above words of truth, addressed to the Corinthians, have not a reference to sinners, but to the preachers of the Gospel, of whom the Apostle speaks in this place. The sense they contain is the following:—The qualities of all doctrines shall at last be made manifest: time will reveal them in the fire of temptation and suffering. True and stable doctrine is distinguished from that which is unfounded and false: if any one's doctrine does not endure this trial, his labour will prove to have been in vain; yet he himself, if he lose not the faith, may be saved in the same trial, like a brand plucked from the burning. Here, as in the whole Word of God, there is not a word about purgatory.

XIX.

Though the spiritual power has a right to absolve from sin, on repentance being manifested; though such absolution may and ought to be asked for the dead as well as the living, because God can hear prayers equally for the living and the dead, being "not the God of the dead, but of the living," Matt. xxii. 32; nevertheless, no one has the power to deliver sinners from torments by the application of the works of supererogation of Jesus Christ and of the saints; because the merits of Jesus Christ are not under the controll of man: and works of supererogation in the saints are impossible, as they themselves are only saved by grace.

XIX.

The dignitaries of the Church have power to redeem people from the torments of purgatory, by means of indulgences or dispensations; which are a deliverance of sinners from merited punishment, by the application to them of the works of supererogation of Jesus Christ and his favourites.

REMARK.—The doctrines of purgatory and of indulgences make the narrow path of salvation too broad. It is not difficult for sinners to give gold and receive heaven, and for the pastor to give heaven and get gold. But it is not so easy to get to the real kingdom of God: it is taken by force: Matt. xi. 12.

In giving this interesting document to the public, from the pen of one of the most distinguished pupils of the late Metropolitan of Moscow, Platon—whose System of Divinity I translated from the Slavonic, and published in 1814, and whose principles are still taught in the spiritual schools, and propagated in the writings of the modern Russian clergy—I have no intention whatever thereby to insinuate that the body of the Russian people, or even many of the lower clergy, possess such distinct views as are here exhibited of the leading doctrines of the Gospel.

The people in general are still illiterate, and sunk in ignorance and superstition to a degree which would scarcely be credited. Let any one, on his first arrival in Petersburg, enter the Church of St. Nicholas, for instance, on a holiday, in the time of service, and, placing himself in a corner, calmly contemplate the scene before him: he might easily be led to the conclusion, that the Russians are to be counted among the most ignorant and superstitious of nations. The splendor of the building, with its gaudy decorations; the sumptuous dresses of the clergy, composed of bright-coloured brocades, covered with embroidery and bespangled with gems; the vocal music; the odours of incense ascending before the sacred pictures, from the golden censer waving in the hand of the officiating priest; the great number of pictures covering the walls, overlaid with gold and silver plates in the form of robes, studded with pearls and precious stones, before which some hundreds of wax-lights and lamps of different sizes are burning; the people of all classes standing and worshipping (for none sit there); some turning to their respective tutelary saints, and prostrating themselves before them in various acts of humiliation; others bargaining for tapers at the stalls where they are sold in the church, then lighting them, and with many crossings and ceremonies placing them before their favourite pictures, as an offering, and a symbol of the sincerity of their devotion—having beheld these, let him turn his attention from the almost confounding splendor and stupefying effects of this crowded scene, more minutely to contemplate its parts, and mark the peculiar dresses, and looks, and attitudes of individuals.

He will see much to excite his feelings of compassion and sympathy: -Here the aged sire of fourscore, devoutly crossing and slowly prostrating himself before the picture of his tutelary saint, his legs and arms trembling beneath him, ere his forehead and hoary locks reach the pavement: what must it cost such a feeble old man to perform this most fatiguing act of his devotion, perhaps forty or fifty times in a morning!—There the devout mother, with her babe in her arms, teaching its infant hand to make the figure of the cross, by touching, with the thumb and first two fingers united, first its forehead, then its breast, next the right shoulder, and afterwards the left; and to lisp the Gospodi Pomilui: and when the priest brings out the crucifix, at the end of the service, to bestow the benediction, behold she presses forward in the crowd, and devoutly embraces the feet of the image of the suffering Saviour, and the infant follows her example!—More enlightened mothers may here take a salutary lesson. Let them unite the tender solicitude of the Russian parent with the practice of Timothy's mother; and then shall their children be protected from the evils of superstition and infidelity, and become wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus.

On beholding this and similar scenes—I shall never forget the impression made on my own mind, when I first viewed them, on entering Russia in 1805!—without any further knowledge of the service, people, and principles of the Greek Church, the traveller must at once come to the conclusion that the Eastern Church is, in all respects, as corrupt in doctrine, and as superstitious in practice, as the Church of Rome. On obtaining better information, however, he finds this a hasty conclusion, as it regards doctrine, and not borne out by facts; for the Church that permits every one of its members to read the Holy Scriptures in a language which he understands, and acknowledges this Word as the highest tribunal in matters of faith on earth, is still possessed of the best reformer of all superstition;—a reformation which will no doubt take place with the increase of learning and Scriptural knowledge, both in Russia and Greece. And surely it is matter of joyful hope to the lovers of truth, that a system, in so many respects evangelical as the above presented to us by the present Metropolitan of Moscow, is still professed by the most enlightened of the prelates and clergy in Russia, and is taught in the spiritual academies and seminaries of that great empire to upwards of 30,000 young men preparing for the sacred profession, that they, in their turn, may preach the same to the people.

It is much to be regretted that those young men have so little time and opportunity, after finishing their academical course, for making further progress in studies suited to their profession. The cares of a family (for marriage must indispensably precede ordination in the Russian Church), their labours among their flocks, the scanty support which most of them receive, together with their isolated situation in country villages, where few traces of education and civilized life have yet entered, render this almost impracticable.

Among the obligations bishops come under at ordination, are the following:—"I will diligently endeavour to prohibit all frauds under pretences of piety, whether committed by ecclesiastics or laymen. I will take care that the homage due to God shall not be transferred to holy pictures, nor false miracles ascribed to them, whereby the true worship is perverted, and a handle given to adversaries to reproach the orthodox: on the contrary, I will study that pictures be respected only in the sense of the holy orthodox Church, as set forth in the Second General Council of Nice."

And Platon, in his System of Divinity, thus expounds the practice of the Oriental Church in reference to the "We do not," says he, "transgress above subject. against this Commandment (the First) when we invoke departed saints; for this invocation, as understood by our Holy Church, is very different from the invocation of God. We call on the name of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, as the Supreme Lord and Almighty Upholder of all things; and we address the saints as His servants, but who with Him inhabit a blessed eternity. vocation of God consists in the most humble subjection of spirit to the Divine Majesty, and in founding all our hopes upon Him; but the invocation of saints consists in the uniting our prayers with theirs. In support of this, it is sufficient to observe, that the saints, while still upon the earth, prayed for others, and required others to pray for them, as we clearly see from Rom. xv. 30. 2 Cor. i. 11. Phil. i. 4. Acts xii. 5. And now that they are drawn near, or rather united unto God, and continually behold His face in glory, it is impossible that they should not have the most sincere desire for the salvation of all believers; and if so, what inconsistency is there in joining our prayers and desires to those which such saints as Paul, for instance, presents or feels? this the invocation of the saints consists. But this invocation does not set aside the all-powerful mediation of Jesus Christ: for His mediation is the continual and absolutely necessary foundation both of our prayers and of the intercession of the saints. However, we ought not foolishly to imagine that this respect, given by us to the saints, will be of any advantage to us, if we live in sin and impenitence; for there can be no honour shewn to the saints equal to that of imitating their lives, and trusting in God alone, according to their example. Those, therefore, are inexcusable, and grievously transgress against this Commandment, who render unto the favourites of God, divine, or nearly divine, honours, and who trust in them almost as much as in God himself: who offer up prayers to them more frequently than to Him; who respect their memory and keep their holidays with a greater degree of devotion than the holidays of the Lord, and reverence their pictures more than those of our Saviour himself. For the favourites of God are by no means so great; they are the servants of God. and the work of His hands; consequently, betwixt them and God there is an infinite difference. It is necessary, therefore, for every one to be very watchful that he be not infected with such errors."

In another place, when explaining the Second Commandment, he says:-- "But, notwithstanding all that has been said, this lawful and holy reverencing of the pictures may be turned into the most abominable sin of idolatry. This is the case when any one hopes in or attaches all his respect to the holy pictures, and trusts in their material substance; when, for instance, any one finds greater sanctity in one picture than in another, or places in them any hope of salvation. They, too, are chargeable with this guilt, who bring their own particular picture into the church along with them, and worship only before it; or who respect those pictures more which are adorned than the unadorned, the old more than the new, or decline prayer altogether when they have not a picture before them. All these, and such like, are great transgressors, and prove a great disgrace to the real profession of the Christian faith. In order to avoid the above-mentioned errors, it is necessary to remember.

1st, That the worship of God can never be sincere, unless it proceed from a contrite and unfeigned spirit. For all external rites of worship are only indications in testimony of our internal piety and sincerity towards God, without which they signify nothing. And therefore the Gospel requires, that the worshippers of God should worship Him in spirit (not externally alone) and in truth, or not in hypocrisy. 2dly, We must hold to the divine word alone, and rest assured that it only contains the true rules by which we ought to please God; and therefore Christ said, concerning the Holy Scriptures, that in them is contained eternal life."

In the above extracts the late Metropolitan of Moscow, Platon, has distinctly acknowledged and condemned the various ways in which his ignorant and superstitious countrymen grossly transgress the First and Second Commandments. In fact, he has in these passages enumerated the prevailing sins of the Russians of all classes, connected with the invocation of saints and the use of pictures in their worship. And how manifest is it in the above passages, that the metropolitan felt deeply, as many other dignitaries of the Russian Church, with whom I am acquainted, do feel the degrading and unscriptural character of these practices! How lame is his defence of the invocation of saints! He finds himself at a loss to preserve even a shadow of consistency with the declared will of God in the sacred writings: for he was well aware of the mere impossibility that illiterate peasants should mark the nice distinction which he himself has drawn betwixt the homage paid to the Saviour and that given to the saints: and having had innumerable occasions of observing the idolatrous ideas which they in general actually entertain respecting the pictures and powers of departed saints, and their idolatrous practices connected with their veneration for their withered remains preserved in caves, monasteries, and churches, he at last brings forth the grand antidote against all these errors in principles and practice:—"We must hold to the divine word alone; and rest assured that it only contains the true rules by which we ought to please God."

That such a principle is unhesitatingly admitted by Platon, Philaret, and many thousands of the clergy who have been trained in the spiritual academies and seminaries under them, opens a door of hope for the gradual advancement of purer religious worship among the Russians: and how far this desirable object has been promoted by the labours of Bible Societies in that empire, future generations will be more able thoroughly to estimate than the present.

Philaret's Comparative View did not, I believe, succeed in producing a change in the mind of the young prince Galitzin, for whom and for others it was at that time written: but there is no doubt that the discovery, made at this period, of the depredations committed by the Jesuits upon the National Church, the fanatical Popish sentiments instilled into the nephew of the Minister for Spiritual Affairs, and the opposition which they made to the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, hastened their final expulsion from the empire, in the year 1820. that time, their number, in different parts of Russia, amounted to 674; and according to their "Catalogus Sociorum et Officiorum Societatis Jesu, in Imperio Rossiaco, in annum 1816," their bands were skilfully stationed, in the following order, throughout the empire. In their academy at Polotsk they had 112; in their two houses at Puza, 37; at their residence in Uswaldenses, 11; in their college at Mogileff, 14; in the college at Orsha, 19; in their establishment in St. Petersburg, 26; at their college in Witepsk, 16; in the Mission at Astrachan, 5; in the Mission at Mosdok, 2; in the Mission at Odessa, 14; in the Mission at Saratoff, 18; in the Irkutsk Mission, 3; in the Tomsk Mission, 3; and the rest were scattered abroad in every part of the country, as domestic teachers, and residents in families.

Here, in Polotsk, their establishment was splendid; and attached to it, they possessed 11,000 slaves, with extensive territories. The ukaz, which expelled them from the empire, "never more to return, under any name or character," was dated March 13, 1820; and by it, their whole property, in lands, houses, money, books, papers, &c. was confiscated, and ordered to be applied to the benefit of the Roman-catholic Church in Russia. On their reaching the frontier of the empire, the Emperor Alexander ordered them to be supplied with from thirty to fifty ducats each, to bear their expenses to some other place of residence.

But though this mighty force of papal agency was removed from the Russian territories by one stroke of the Autocratic pen, yet the influence which they had acquired was not so easily to be annihilated; and there is no doubt, that in the succeeding intrigues, which were played off so successfully against the Russian Bible Society, their powerful friends in the capital took a part.

Polotsk was formerly the provincial town of a district of the same name; which, in 1796, was united to that of Witepsk. It is beautifully situated on the right banks of the Dwina and Polotka, and is one of the oldest towns mentioned in Russian history. It was known to the ancients under the name of Peltiscum; and in the time of Rurick, the Russian Egbert, it had its own princes, who reigned there until the time of Vladimir the Great.

This prince, irritated at the refusal of the princess Rogneda, daughter of the reigning prince Rogvalde, to marry him, laid siege to the city, took it, killed the prince and his two sons, married the daughter against her will, and added the principality of Polotsk to his dominions. After this, the son of Rogneda obtained this principality from his father, Vladimir; and his descendants continued to reign there for several centuries, until 1305, when Guedemin built Wilna, which became the capital of those parts of Lithuania. But even to the time of Peter the Great, the Russian Tzars continued to take the title of Prince of Polotsk. In the intervening ages, it was repeatedly taken and retaken by the Russians and Poles; but generally remained in the hands of the latter, until 1772, when Catherine II. united it to her empire.

At present, though the Jesuits are expelled, it is still the residence of different orders of popish monks. The Dominicans, Bernardines, Trinitarians, Piarists, Basillians, Franciscans, and Greek Uniats, have all their respective monasteries and churches in Polotsk, many of which are richly endowed. These splendid public buildings contribute greatly to give the town an imposing appearance, especially on approaching it. There are comparatively few Protestants and Greco-Russians in the place. Its present inhabitants are not above 6000, among whom there are a very considerable proportion of Jews.

LEAVING Polotsk, I continued my route up the right bank of the River Dwina; and, travelling all night, reached Witepsk early in the morning of the 2d of June. I obtained lodgings in the Riga Inn, where, as in all inns in the interior of Poland and Russia, accommodations are very bad.

In 1816, I had formed the White-Russian Bible Society in this place; of which the Governor-general, Alexander, duke of Wurtemberg, became President. On this occasion, as formerly, I met with a most kind reception from his highness; and also from the duchess, a most intelligent and amiable lady, sister of Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg, now king of Belgium. My letters of introduction to the Civil-governor, Tormazoff, secured me a seat at his table, and every attention and facility for visiting the prisons, hospitals, &c. during my stay. On Sunday I attended worship, in a private house; where Mr. Wenzel, the Lutheran pastor of Polotsk, preached, and confirmed four young persons. There were about 50 individuals present. The discourse was a singular mixture of truth and error. The doctrines of the Fall and Atonement were not touched upon in the catechetical instructions given to the young. The pastor called upon me in the evening; when I had an opportunity of stating to him freely my views of Christian doctrine, and the deficiencies of his sermon and instructions in the morning. He took my observations calmly.

The Secretaries of the Society told me, that the cause here had to struggle, from its very commencement, against - the determined opposition of the Jesuits, who endeavoured to mar its progress in every possible way, and threatened with severe spiritual censures every one in whose possession a Testament should be found;—that what had been done in the work had been accomplished principally by the sixty congregations of Russians of the Greek communion scattered throughout the province; so that their income and distributions could not be compared with those of other Auxiliaries in the interior of Russia, where all were of one mind as to the duty of every one's possessing and reading the Holy Scriptures. They had distributed 68 Bibles and 128 Testaments. addition to these, the Roman-catholic priest, Polonsky, had himself disposed of about 150 Polish Testaments. Their income had been 4538 roubles (1801.).

I visited the Provincial Prison, Hospital, and Poorhouse; all three built on a rising ground near the south gate of the city, in an airy situation. But this is almost the only commendation I can bestow upon them; for they were miserable-looking decayed wooden buildings, and their inmates destitute of every thing requisite to make their lot tolerable. In three rooms in the prison, each of them about twenty-four feet square, we found ninety-seven criminals, of whom thirteen were females, separated from the men by a wooden partition. No debtors. Among the criminals were eight convicted of murder. The prisoners daily received their fifteen kopicks, in money, and not in food, as in Pleskoff.

The Poor-house was nothing better than a decayed cottage, filled with aged and blind, about fifty in number, miserably lodged and clad; but they expressed themselves satisfied with the food provided for them. The Hospital is likewise a wooden hut: there were only eighteen sick in it, and even those badly accommodated. On inquiry, I found that twenty-four copies of the Holy Scriptures had been sent to these institutions by the Society here; but the Director, a Baron von Sacken, had judged it proper to lock them all up, except a single Slavonic Testament, which was in the hands of an aged man in the Poor-house. The reason he gave for so doing was, that he was afraid they might be lost or destroyed! I removed his fears in regard to the consequences, even should this happen; and he promised to supply with copies such as could read, in accordance with the object for which they had been sent. On conversing with the governor, at dinner, on the very wretched state of the public institutions of this province, he told me that Government had granted a sum for the erection of a new prison and poor-house; that the plans for the buildings were already approved of; but the money had not been remitted.

In the evening, I paid a visit to the Russian priest, Okolovitch, who was one of the most zealous friends of the Society, and who gave a distressing account of the exertions made by the Jesuits to prevent the Word of God from reaching the hands of the people.

The Jews also had claimed the attention of the Committee here; and General Tschorba seemed to take an active part in distributing the Hebrew Testament among them. I paid a visit to two of their schools, in the suburbs: and conversed with several of their teachers on the prophecies respecting the Messiah. Though all the Polish Jews speak a sort of broken German, yet none of them were able to read the German characters: their own books are either in Hebrew or in Jewish German. with Rabbinical characters. At a subsequent visit, I put into their hands two copies of the Hebrew New Testament, which they willingly accepted. I also visited several of their families; but was disgusted at the indications of filth in their dwellings, and want of cleanliness Many of them had cutaneous about their persons. affections of a most offensive nature.

In reasoning with those among them who have any degree of knowledge, one frequently meets with such a manifestation of contempt for the peculiar doctrines of the Christian Religion, that they seem encompassed as with adamantine walls, resting securely, without inquiry, in the vain imaginations of their own conceits. In speaking with Mohammedans and Jews on these mysterious subjects, the greatest care and acuteness of reasoning are necessary, in order to place before them the pure doctrines of Scripture, as free as possible from human definitions.

The town of Witepsk stands on the banks of the Dwina and Witepa, which run through it. It is very ancient, and is said to have been known to the Slavonians and Greeks as early as the tenth century. The different religious orders mentioned under the article Polotsk abound here also, with several others; each in its own monastery, and living in mutual jealousies, and not unfrequently open The Russians have only one church, which belongs to the garrison: there are, however, 8 monasteries for Roman-catholic monks and nuns. 3 Romancatholic churches, 11 Uniat Roman-catholic churches, 2 Seminaries, a Gymnasium, and 3 synagogues, with about 14,000 inhabitants. The country around is level, and abounds in extensive forests; and the land produces abundance of grain and excellent hemp. But civilization is still in its infancy among the people; and in the towns, though efforts are made at improvement, yet it proceeds very slowly, under the influence of such spiritual guides as the troops of popish monks and friars above men-The population of the province is estimated at 672,000, chiefly Poles, among whom the Russians are but thinly scattered; but the Jews are very numerous.

I left Witepsk about six in the evening; and directed my course for Orsha, which I reached the following morning about ten. My reasons for travelling in the night are, first, because one can seldom find a place to lodge in comfortably betwixt towns; and secondly, because the nights being light and cool in summer, it is far more pleasant to travel by night than by day. In winter, the first reason, united with the shortness of the days, induce travellers with post-horses generally to travel night and day.

In the post-house at Orsha, I fell into conversation with a number of Jews, on the signs of the times, and their expected deliverance through the Messiah. They told me that the Rev. L. Way had visited them, and had left them some Testaments. They refused to accept more; but, afterwards, one of the number came to me privately, and earnestly begged for a copy, which I gave him. The Russian priest, principal director of the Orsha Bible Association, had collected a considerable sum, and circulated a number of Slavonian copies of the Scriptures; but he said that the members of the Jesuit college of the place were indefatigable in opposing the distribution of the Polish Testament among the Roman Catholics.

We crossed the field of the battle of Krasnoy. The mounds or tumuli raised over the heaps of slain were numerous; and so fresh, as not yet to be covered over with sod. The post-road passes through this field of death; and the recollection of the slaughter of so many thousands of French and Russians, on that occasion, fills the reflecting mind with melancholy.

We reached Skloff in the afternoon, where the Jews were very anxious to obtain copies of the Hebrew Testament. Having very carefully tried the abilities of such as applied, by making them read and translate passages to me, I distributed ten copies among them, counselling them to make a good use of them.

Most of the roads in White Russia run in straight lines, being ditched, and planted with rows of birch-trees. The clay cast up from each side forms the road. In dry weather they are pleasant to travel on, but after rains they become almost impassable.

The peasantry here seem to be in better circumstances than those around Pleskoff. The food of the Russian peasant differs much from that of the lower classes in any other country in Europe. The great number of what they call postnie dni, fast-days, throughout the year, have no doubt been the means of rendering their taste somewhat peculiar. They eat more fish, when they can procure it, than flesh; and are very fond of mushrooms (which they dry and preserve in great quantities for use during the winter fasts), cucumbers, cabbages, &c.; but they do not discover any great partiality for vegetables in general. Until the beginning of the eighteenth century they were strangers to almost every kind of esculent, except cabbages, onions, garlic, cucumbers, radishes, gourds, and melons. They seem to be fonder of smoked and salted meat than of fresh. dishes are much relished, especially in summer, when the potvinia (a cold soup made of herbs, fish, and quass) is counted a delicacy, even at the tables of the great. Much of their food is highly seasoned.—I shall here, once for all, descend to a few particulars.

Rye-bread is in common use throughout the whole empire. It is daily upon the table of the peasant and the prince; and every family bakes it for their own consumption. It is usually well leavened; and possesses a degree of acidity, which, to the stranger, is not at first agreeable, but is considered indispensable to suit the peculiar taste of the Russian. The loaves are round, from eighteen to twenty-four inches in diameter, and six or seven inches thick. This rye-bread, commonly called tschernoi hleb (black bread), is the staple support of the common people. With three pounds of this bread, an ounce of salt to strew on it, and a can of guass. the labouring man performs the hardest work, and the soldier goes through the greatest fatigue, without murmuring. In general, they prefer rye to wheaten bread, because they affirm the former to be more nourishing. Very little white bread is yet in use among the people or in the army.

The common drink of the Russian people is called quass or kvass, a fermented acidulated liquor made of rye-meal and malt; which, to those unaccustomed to it, is not agreeable at first, but is found to be wholesome, and anti-scorbutic in its qualities. Every family in town and country prepares it for their own use.

A favourite and common dish among them is a kind of broth, called tstchee. It is made of water, sour cabbages chopped small, with a piece of pork or beef, boiled up together. In the time of their fasts they use oil in it, instead of butcher's meat. The ancient Russians, like the present Raskolniks or Dissenters, abstained from veal, hare, doves, crayfish, and also from every animal which had died in its blood: they also accounted those unclean which were killed by females. Oxen, sheep, and swine, are slaughtered to supply the tables of the common people on holidays; for it is seldom they think of such fare on other occasions. Salted cucumbers form a daily dish at the peasant's table, the whole year round: they are likewise in favour, as a salad, at the tables of the nobles and merchants, especially in winter. Salted cabbages and cucumbers form a very considerable article of internal commerce: they are brought in large vats from the southern provinces, where the climate favours their growth, to Moscow, Petersburg, and other large towns; and daily sold, both wholesale and retail, in the public The preparation, in autumn, of a sufficient quantity of these pickled vegetables forms, in every family, an important part of domestic economy.

The peasantry keep Lent, and indeed all their fasts, with great strictness. They have four great fasts in the year, during which they are not allowed to eat flesh, eggs or butter, or to drink milk; but they are obliged to confine their nourishment to bread, vegetables, and fish. The fast before Easter is regulated by that moveable feast: it continues eight weeks. In the first week they eat butter, eggs, milk, &c., and abstain only from meat. This week is called Maslonitsa, or the butterweek, and is, properly speaking, the carnival of the Eastern Church, being spent in diversions.

The second is called St. Peter's Fast, and lasts from the Monday after Whitsunday to the 29th of June; and, consequently, is sometimes longer and sometimes shorter.

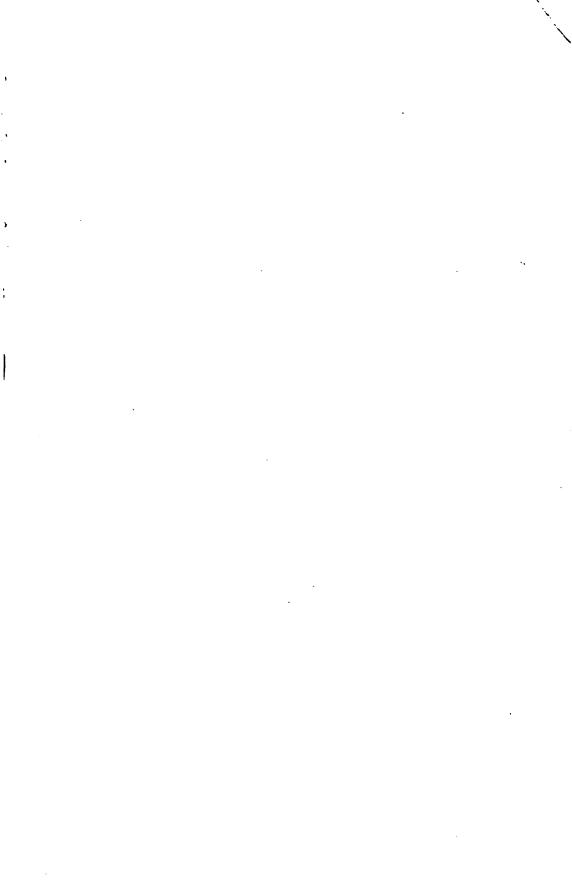

The third is the Fast of the Virgin Mary, which begins on the 1st, and continues till the 15th of August.

The fourth is St. Philip's Fast, beginning on the 15th of November, and continuing to the 26th of December.

Besides these, the usual weekly fasts are Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year.

The merchants and middle class observe the fasts with nearly equal rigour: but the nobles in general do not subject themselves too strictly to these privations; except the aged females among them, many of whom try to atone for the sins of giddy youth by the severest austerities in old age, and become devotees. Excesses in eating, drinking, and rioting are committed both before and after their long fasts; and are scarcely surpassed by the carnivals of the Roman Catholics.

So recently as the seventeenth century, most of the Russian nobles ate and drank out of wooden plates and cups with gilt edges, prepared and sold by the monks. The same kind of service is still in use among the common people, the country merchants, the monks, and lower clergy. But, as in ancient times it was the fashion for every noble family to have a silver cup, called kubok, out of which the guests drank to the health of each other, so in the present day this custom generally remains among the merchants in the provinces, and among the country clergy; though it has fled from the tables of the great, where, in the European style, every one has his own glass.

Izbiten is a substitute for tea; and consists of potherbs, ginger, pepper, and honey, boiled up together, and drunk like tea, which it much resembles in colour. It is a very ancient Russian beverage, and was formerly used by all classes: now its use is restricted to the common people; and it is sold in the streets of Moscow and Petersburg by the izbitenchiki, who carry it about boiling hot, and deal it out in tumblers, as the people require it. This is a refreshing warm drink, which is very appropriate to the condition of the poor peasantry coming to market in severe frosts and stormy weather.

Tea was first introduced into Russia in the middle of the 17th century. The conquest of Siberia brought the Russians in contact with the Chinese; and the transports of tea overland from China to Europe soon became a very important article of commerce, which continues, to a great extent, to the present day. The use of it is becoming more and more general among the people, who are now frequently seen, on market-days, sitting in the coffee-houses, in groupes, in their sheep-skin coats, drinking tea. As this predilection gains ground among them, it will no doubt serve to moderate the use of spirituous liquors; the state of their finances putting it out of their power to indulge in both.

The Russians are fond of vinous liquors, of which they themselves prepare a great variety. Those domestic preparations of this kind known under the name of nalivki are made from different kinds of fruits, and are often of an excellent quality; but since the introduction of foreign wines into every part of the empire, it is said that the art of preparing the nalivki has declined.

In ancient times, they were accustomed to receive their wines from Greece; which were principally used for the eucharist, and as medicine; or, at special feasts, in the palaces of the Tzars and Boiars. But French and Rhenish wines are now drunk in great abundance among all classes of the people, except the peasantry, who still prefer their national brandy, called vodka. They are also very partial to mead, which is distinguished by different names, according to the manner of boiling it, and the kinds, qualities, and colour of the honey and fruits used in the process: it is sold almost in every wine-cellar, forms one of the favourite liquors drunk in the families of the merchants, and is prepared by their wives and domestics.

The predilection of the Russians for brandy is well known: the distillation of it is said to have been introduced among them about the year 1398, by the Genoese, then inhabiting the peninsula of the Crimea: it is now become one of the principal sources of the national revenue, and, alas! of the demoralization of the people also.

The Russians of former days used to get drunk upon their mead and nalivki; but as soon as they became acquainted with the superior strength of spirits distilled from corn, like all uncivilized tribes that have been put to a similar trial, the vice of drunkenness increased among them in a tenfold degree. The testimony of travellers during the 17th century confirms this statement; for even in the days of Peter the Great the nobles spent a great part of their time in drinking, and seldom separated until they were intoxicated. This debasing and corrupting custom continued, in all its force, until about the middle of the last century. In the country villages, at the seats of the nobility, at every meeting of friends in town, on all holidays, at marriages, baptisms, and burials, the company, of whatever rank, never broke up till many of them were thus deprived of their senses. Sometimes these revels lasted for weeks together. But as European manners began to take effect, in transforming the language, dress, habitations, tables, equipages, occupations, and pastimes of the higher circles, especially during the reign of Catherine II., excessive drinking by degrees became less fashionable: and I am happy to say, that this salutary reform still predominates, so that I have rarely met with intemperance in the better classes of society. The merchants, however, the lower orders of the clergy, and the people, are still too much addicted to this ruinous vice.

But it may be necessary here to inquire how far the Government itself is accessary to this national sin. The sale of every kind of spirituous liquors, though now in the hands of Government, was formerly free: but in consequence of the miseries which flowed from this source of corruption, and the multitudes of families which were entirely ruined by the intemperate use of ardent spirits, the Tzars first laid restrictions on the distillation and sale of it, and afterwards took the management of the whole concern into their own hands. This reason, which is given by the Russian writers as the origin of the sale of brandy becoming a monopoly of the Government, is, no doubt, plausible at first sight; but how has it been abused! Instead of restraining the use of brandy, the Government, even of the present day, affords every facility to the people to obtain it, in order to enhance the gain derived from this iniquitous source; which amounts to nearly one-fourth of the whole revenue of the empire!

Their own authors say, that the first spirit-shop, called kabak, was erected in Moscow by order of Tzar Ioan Vasillivitch, for the use of his guards. Tzar Feodor ordered it to be pulled down; but Tzar Boris Gudonoff, perceiving that this tax would become a source of immense income, established it again, and had it regularly licensed to sell brandy and other inebriating liquors, for the benefit of the crown. The door to intemperance was now thrown wide open, under the outspread wings of the Russian Eagle*; and gin-shops sprang up in every town and village throughout the dominions of the Tzar; which Oliarius found to be the case in 1633. early as 1617, the kabaks were extended to Siberia, and the means of intoxication, to which they were formerly strangers, introduced among the wandering heathen Tzar Michael Feodrotribes of that extensive country. vitch, perceiving this vice increasing to a ruinous extent among his subjects, and the incalculable miseries which it had introduced into almost every village in his dominions, shut up the kabaks, and allowed the brandy to be sold only in certain places, and under restrictions. in the succeeding reign. Alexie Michaelovitch farmed out the sale of brandy, as in former times, to the highest bidder; and ordered a kabak to be opened in every town, and three in Moscow. In the course of time they became innumerable; and they abound in the present day as much as ever, under the name of kabaki and piteinoi domi in Great Russia, and of shenks in Little Russia. These places are scenes of perpetual drunkenness and riot throughout the day, and the haunts of the very scum of the population during the night: they are never shut.

Instead, however, of the Government farming out the sale of spirituous liquors to a number of private individuals called otkuptchiki, in the year 1819 they took the management of it into their own hands. The Minister of Finance is at the head of it, and the deputy-governors in the provinces are his chief agents. This new regulation was the work of Gurieff, Minister of Finance, in order, it is said, to encourage the more general use of brandy in the villages, and thereby increase the revenues of the crown. The number of distilleries throughout the empire is great, and the quantity of spirits which they prepare annually immense. Those of them which belong to the nobles and merchants issue about twentyfive millions of vedros: those of the crown two millions: which, calculating three gallons to a vedro, gives the enormous quantity of eighty-one millions of gallons of brandy alone, drunk every year by the peasantry of this empire!

It is astonishing, indeed, that such a system should have been carried on, even under the government of such a pious, benevolent, and humane prince as the late Emperor Alexander, whose exertions have been so distinguished in promoting every thing that is good among his people; but the fact is, that the evil has become a pillar on which the Government, in its present form, rests; and the removal of it would require more energetic measures than it is thought safe as yet to resort to.

The time of the year in which the peasantry are engaged in the severest bodily labour is during the hay and harvest months, from June to October. Now this is the time of one of their longest fasts, in which for six weeks they eat no flesh, but subsist on black bread, quass, buck-wheat, cucumbers, radishes, onions, and mushrooms.

The peasantry are of a sound constitution, stout and firmly built, but generally of a middle stature; and still strangers to many enervating diseases which accompany civilization, wealth, and luxury, and which cause so great a proportion of the inhabitants of such cities as London and Paris to drag out a miserable existence. They are fond of manly exercises; and in summer, the evenings are often spent in the open air, in singing in chorus, dancing to the bagpipes or ballalaiki, and amusing themselves with their national games. Yet the custom of early marriage, and, above all, of choosing the finestlooking young men in the villages, in point of stature and features, for the ranks of the military, from generation to generation, has already had a deteriorating effect upon them. Almost all the finest-looking men are thus taken from the village circles, and the dwarfish and diminutive in stature are left to marry and propagate their kind*. If this practice continue, they must, according to the operation of natural causes, become a still more diminutive race; for the great mass of the Russian military are doomed to a life of celibacy; so that when the soldier falls in the field, root and branch are cut off. And as the difficulty is becoming every day greater to find a sufficient number of young men in all respects agreeing with the military standard, the senate has ordered, in a decree sanctioned by the emperor in February 1831, that such young men as may happen to be blind of one eye, or destitute of their fore teeth, shall be admitted into the ranks. Many of the youths in the villages main themselves, in order to escape the

Instances of extraordinary longevity are frequent among the common people: the causes are doubtless the natural vigour of their constitutions, the simplicity of their mode of living, abstemiousness in food, and generally good climate. Many of them reach the age of 90 or 100, and some individuals live even to the age of 125 or 130. I remember, in the year 1808, seeing a female, in a Kozack village on the Don, who was in her 125th year, and who from the time she was 100 years of age had been confined to her bed; or rather to her board, which she preferred to a bed. Her sons and her sons' sons were around her, both generations grey-headed with age: they seemed to nurse her with great care.

About the middle of the sixteenth century tobacco was introduced into Russia, and was passionately welcomed by the common people; so much so, that a prohibition from the patriarch came out against it, strengthened by an ukaz in 1634, forbidding its use, under pain of the knout, slitting the nostrils, cutting off the nose, and exile†. This severity, however, was found inadequate to deter the people from using it. At last, some monks from Mount Athos spread about legends of a terrifying nature concerning its origin and use, saying that it sprung originally from the excrements of Satan, and that the person who used it would perish for ever! The Raskolniks of the present day hold strictly to these opinions; and have even pressed some texts of Scripture into their service, in condemnation of this execrated herb.

† Fourteen years after the publication of this extraordinary ukaz, it was introduced into the Code. But on the 11th of July, 1698, Peter the Great gave permission to his subjects to trade in tobacco throughout his dominions, except in the towns and villages of the Kozacks, where the opposition to it among the Raskolniks had been fanatical. In the present time it is cultivated to a great extent in the southern provinces; but it is not generally used among the peasantry. It forms an important article of trade with the Mohammedan and Heathen tribes, who are very fond of it, and buy it from the Russian peasantry.

Probably it was to meet these prejudices that the Empress Elizabeth, by ukaz, forbad the taking of snuff in the churches. The domestics of the palace were, by her, set to watch in the time of divine service in the Court chapel; and commanded to take by force the boxes from the nobles, should they observe them taking snuff!

On my arrival in Mogileff, I was admitted into comfortable lodgings in the palace of the aged archbishop Daniel, of whose great kindness I had partaken so largely in 1816, at the formation of the Bible Society for this province. His eminence, and the archimandrite, gave me the details of their transactions since that period. which proved both gratifying and encouraging. They had collected upwards of 30,000 roubles (1200l.); had formed five Associations in the district towns; and distributed 3200 Bibles and Testaments in different languages. of which number 1800 copies had been put into the hands of the military. These were disposed of in the army, in accordance with the regulation of the late much-lamented Field-marshal Barclay de Tolly. Each regiment was furnished with a Bible and 12 Testaments: viz. one for every company, and the Bible for the chaplain and church service of the regiment. The officers alone contributed 10,000 roubles, to promote the good cause. Much opposition to the distribution of the Polish Testament was made here, also, by the Jesuits, who seem to possess almost unbounded confidence among the people. The Bull of Pius VII., issued against the Bible Society in 1816, has become a powerful weapon in the

During my stay, I paid a visit to the provincial Prison, a large brick building one story high, forming three sides of a square: the fourth side is a wall, with the gate in the centre of it. The apartments were large, and capable of being well ventilated: but they were all crowded to excess: the first with thieves, the second with deserters, and the third with a number of fine young recruits, confined there until they were clothed. and the back part of their head shaved, which is the usual mark put upon all new-levied men for the army, in order to prevent their escaping detection, should they attempt to run away. As there were several other apartments, the walls of which had been newly whitewashed, I inquired, of the officer, why the prisoners were not divided, and part put into them. The answer was. "Because it would require too many soldiers to guard them." Their allowance is the same as at Witepsk. 15 kopicks a day. The Committee had sent to them some copies of the Bible and Testament; but I did not observe any in use. The Roman-catholic priests visit the prisoners twice a week; and there is a room appropriated to a chapel. Neither debtors nor murderers were among them; but there were several Jews, imprisoned for having tried to evade the late census.

I next visited the Poor-house—several wooden buildings hastening to decay, and affording a temporary shelter to seventy-six aged poor of both sexes. They seemed to be clean in their apartments, and looked rather comfortable and satisfied. I found a New Testament among them; which I was told one of their number daily read to the rest, who assembled to hear it. The situation is rather high and airy, and the house has a large garden attached to it for the people to walk in. There are seven other small almshouses in Mogileff, attached to an equal number of parish churches: these are principally supported by the parishioners.

According to a late revision, the number of Jews in Mogileff is about 9000: they have two synagogues. There is no general hospital, as yet, for the citizens; but the Governor told me it was in contemplation to erect one. I spoke to him freely on the state of things in the prison; and recommended classification, less-crowded cells, the use of the bath at least once a-week, and that the brick floors should be changed for wood.

The view of the country from the windows of the archbishop's palace is extensive and beautiful. The windings of the Dnieper can be traced through a most fruitful range of country; but there is nothing picturesque in the view, on account of the equality of the surface.

The archbishop, Daniel, is since deceased. He was upwards of seventy, his head "silvered o'er with age;" and, in his course through life, he had seen a great deal of the bloody contests betwixt the Russians and the Poles, in the ineffectual struggles of the latter for independence during the last half century. He had also been particularly zealous and successful in his opposition to the inroads of the Uniats among the members of the Greek Church in these provinces, which formerly belonged to Poland.

Under the denomination of Uniats is understood, in Russia, Poland, and the East, proselytes from the Greek to the Romish Church. At the rupture betwixt the Eastern and Western communions, in the beginning of the ninth century, this system of proselytism to the acknowledgment of the supremacy of the Pope began, and has ever since been carried on with more or less vigour by the disciples of Rome, according as they were able to throw the several ingredients of royal favour, worldly interest, compulsion, and persecution into the scale, in the long and bloody contests which have so often spread devastation and ruin in these disputed provinces, lying betwixt the Roman-catholic kingdom of Poland and the orthodox dominions of the Tzars. In this work of proselyting from the Greek to the Romish Church, the Jesuits have been particularly zealous and successful among the Slavonic tribes belonging to the Eastern Church in the Austrian dominions. Of two millions of Servians, all originally Greek Christians, one half have, by various means, since they fell under the dominions of Austria, been brought over to the Church of Rome. Nor have these attacks been confined to middle Europe: they have been carried on, for nearly 800 years, in the East also, especially in Syria, under the dominion of the Turks: and not only the Greek, but the Armenian Church, has likewise shared the same unwearied annovance from the agents of Rome, whose success of late years among this nation has been incredibly great.

In Constantinople, the proselytes from the Armenian to the Roman-catholic Church are called Schismatic Armenians. After sustaining great persecution from the old Armenian clergy and the Turks, they have at last (1831) obtained, through the influence of the ambassadors of Austria and France, in the present troubled state of Turkey, an act of toleration of their worship, and permission for their Patriarch to reside in Constantinople.

On one or two occasions the Jesuits had nearly succeeded in producing an acknowledgment of the supremacy of the Pope, even at the court of Moscow itself. In the time of Pope Clement VIII. the severity of Jeremiah, patriarch of Constantinople, towards Onesiphorus, metropolitan of Kief, seems to have given great scope to this schism. Jeremiah, on returning from Moscow, where he had been consecrating the first Russian patriarch, Job, discovered, during his stay at Kief, that the said metropolitan had been married a second time; and, on account of this breach of the discipline of the Eastern Church, he expelled him from the see, and put another in his place. This act of severity against a man of excellent character so exasperated the prelates of Little Russia, some of whom, it is said, feared similar treatment for like offences, that the bishops of Vladimir, the exarch of Lutsk, the archbishop of Polotsk, the bishop of Helm, the bishop of Pinsk, the metropolitan of Kief, and others, united in Council in that city in 1595, agreed to join the Church of Rome; and the same year they put their design in execution, notwithstanding all the exertions of the Muscovite clergy to prevent it; and these dioceses, even to the present day, retain their Uniat prelates. The only conditions they made for themselves and their people were, "that the sacrament of the Holy Eucharist should remain as they had been accustomed to administer it, in two kinds, bread and wine; likewise, that the sacrament of Baptism, with all its ceremonies, should continue as formerly; that they should be allowed to practise all the rites and ceremonies of the Greek Church: that marriage should be permitted to the clergy; and that they should not be required to repair to Rome for the confirmation of their episcopacy." As soon as the Pope agreed to these conditions, they seem willingly, says Kamensky, to have sworn to the other Roman-catholic tenets: viz. that of the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, the supremacy of the Pope, the doctrine of Purgatory, the doctrine of Transubstantiation, the doctrine of Works of Supererogation, the decisions of the Councils of Florence and Trent, the Traditions of the Roman Church and her decision respecting the meaning of Scripture, the Romish opinion in regard to the use of images, the power of the Pope to pardon sins, &c. &c.

When the people and nobles heard of what their bishops had done, they complained to the Polish king, and requested that they might be expelled from their dioceses; but the Roman-catholic king not only approved of what their bishops had done, but interdicted all connexion with the Patriarch of Constantinople, and gave every support to the spread of the Uniat principles among his Russian subjects.

The province of Mogileff is about 350 versts long and 300 broad, with a population of upwards of 900,000 souls; all Russians, except a few Lithuanians, and a numerous tribe of Jews, who found a settlement here during the period of the Russian civil wars, when White Russia was in the hands of the Poles. It abounds in extensive forests of fir and hard-wood: those in the district of Tscherikoff are considered the finest. Numbers of the peasantry are employed in felling and floating timber to Riga by the Dwina, and to the Black Sea by the Dnieper, and to those parts of Little Russia which are but scantily supplied with this necessary article.

The principal commodity of trade in Mogileff is leather; there are upwards of twenty tanneries: but its merchants carry on a considerable commerce also with the ports of Danzig, Memel, and Riga, in potashes, hemp, leather, and grain. There are twenty churches in this city; two Greco-Russian monasteries, one of which is for nuns; a seminary for the clergy; two Roman-catholic monasteries: with five Roman-catholic churches.

I drove four versts out of town, to pay a visit to the Military Hospital, a large wooden building of one story. The number of sick and wounded was 220. The wards were remarkably clean, but crowded; there was only space sufficient to pass betwixt the beds. I found no more than two Testaments among them. Those who could read, and had sufficiently recovered to engage in it, were said to be making a good use of them. With the General in command, I was enabled, before leaving Mogileff, to make arrangements for sending 750 copies more of the Holy Scriptures to the army, five copies to each regiment. The archbishop seemed gratified with this arrangement.

Accompanied ten versts on my journey by this venerable prelate, who has shewn me so much kindness during my stay, I retraced my way back to Orsha. Here I again had a long discussion with the postmaster of the place, a Jew, on the subjects in dispute between them and us. He seemed to be well versed in the Talmudic comments on the prophecies relating to the Messiah. But there were a number of other considerations which bore upon the subject, and for which he seemed little prepared; such as, their having no divine sanction for their present mode of worship; how, on moral principles, the Deity can pardon the sinner without an atonement, and still remain unchangeable and just; the insufficiency of their confessions and ceremonies for this purpose; the Scriptural reasons for their long dispersion and unparalleled national sufferings; &c. &c.

From their spiritual state, he turned the conversation, as soon as he conveniently could, to their temporal condition; spoke of the poverty and misery in which so many thousands of them now were in the surrounding country; and seemed particularly desirous that permission should be granted to the Polish Jews to spread into Russia Proper. This I assured him would, I thought, never be permitted by the Government; which, from past experience of the many evils resulting to the Christian population of Poland from the multitudes of Jews who now overrun that country, would not allow them to spread further into the interior of the empire.

From Orsha I continued to travel all night; and passed the fatal bridge of the Berezino in the morning;—dined at Borisof;—and arrived in Minsk about midday, where I obtained a decent room in an inn kept by a German. On my journey, I distributed several Testaments among such of the Jews as I found could understand them. I also learned that the copies the Rev. L. Way had disposed of were passing from hand to hand, and were read. One of those who had received a copy, said to me, "that neither he nor his father had ever read those things before."

I waited on the archbishop of Minsk, Anatolie, who gave me some accounts of the progress of the Bible cause in his extensive diocese. He kindly invited me to dine with him; during which time we discoursed upon several important points of divinity; from which I learned that his eminence had read the works of Jung-Stilling and Ekartshausen, and seemed fond of several of their peculiar opinions, similar to those of Jacob Boehm. In the evening, we spent nearly five hours in like conversation. Anatolie is about fifty years of age, of good natural abilities, and possessing a very considerable share of learning—hospitable, frank, and simple in his manners. The Minsk Society, he told me, had obtained about 6000 roubles in subscriptions, and distributed 424 copies of the Scriptures.

^{*} During the latter years of the reign of Alexander, the severity of Government had relaxed in this respect, on account of the deep interest which that monarch shewed for the spiritual as well as temporal welfare of the Jews: but a short time after the accession of Nicholas to the throne, all Jews were again expelled from Great Russia by an ukaz, and driven back within their ancient limits of residence.

The Minsk Jews had contributed 153 roubles and 40 kopicks, to aid the cause. His eminence told me, that since my last visit to Minsk, two years ago, he had baptized fifteen Jews: one of the Roman-catholic priests had also lately baptized four.

Having obtained the permission of the Authorities, I visited the Prison; which consisted of a large wooden hut, divided into three apartments. In the first we found sixty criminals, among whom were four females and six murderers, without any classification of crime or sex. The place was much crowded; and I wondered that it was possible for them to exist together. But, as it is summer, they are the most of the day in the court, which is spacious, dry, and part of it overgrown with grass. Here, also, they cook their victuals. In the second division we found thirty deserters, less crowded; and in the third, about twenty abandoned females, most of them soldiers' wives and widows, confined for a short time, for misdemeanours.

* On the young peasant being drafted for the army, it not unfrequently happens that he is already married. In this case, his wife, on his entering the military service, is emancipated with himself; but the children born before this period remain in slavery. Yet, as few of these young wives are permitted to follow their husbands in the campaign, or even to live with them when in quarters, they generally remove from the villages, and take service in the towns. When, however, the soldiers live in barracks, as is the case with the Guards in Petersburg, their wives are allowed to live with them; but then, alas! too frequently they become the victims of seduction. Intemperance, quarrels, and separation usually follow, and they fall into confirmed habits of prostitution; so

In the two first wards, I found them supplied with Slavonian, Polish, and Hebrew Testaments, which seemed to have been read. They had no Divine Service; except once a year, when the priest comes to give them the Communion. No bath. Sixteen kopicks per day are allowed each for food; but, in lieu of this, they receive $2\frac{1}{2}$ pounds of bread per day, and meat once a week. A considerable number of the prisoners were Jews.

At a small distance from this gaol we visited the Military Hospital, which contained about fifty sick and wounded. The building is of wood, and temporary; but the wards and beds were not so clean and neat as those of the hospital near Mogileff. In what they style the Town Hospital there were about twenty-five of both sexes, some of them in most loathsome diseases, and manifesting a great want of cleanliness. Both here and in the Military Hospital we found Testaments; but as in the latter there are seven apartments, and only two copies among them, we purpose supplying five copies more, so that they may have one in each ward. The two they have, had made the round of the wards once in seven days, each possessing them a day; and we were told that this was usually a day of joy and comfort to the poor sick and wounded warriors, one of whom read to those who could not.

that from these causes of frustrated marriage, in which the branches of the family are torn from each other, and peculiar exposure to temptation, many of these are found, in the provincial and great towns, reduced to a level with the most degraded of the population. Hence, when able, the poor peasant is known to call into requisition the little property which he and his relatives may possess, to provide a substitute. This, however, is not to be construed into a proof of his loving slavery on the one hand, nor of his dread of a military life on the other; but is to be attributed to the dread of separation from those he loves most, and of the dismemberment of his family as here described.

We went next to see about twenty-five miserable patients, lodged in an old hovel, under the care of a monk of the order of Boni Fratrum. We found this physician to body and soul dividing a kind of meal soup among them; most of whom seemed to be in miserable circumstances, in rags, dirt, and disease; and two were insane.

In the Jewish Hospital we saw forty-five young and old, of both sexes, seemingly without any classification of disease, placed in several small rooms: they certainly presented one of the most appalling scenes of wretchedness I ever witnessed: filth, rags, and pestilential effluvia pervaded the whole place. A small apothecary's shop, with a kind of chapel, occupied one end of the building. The Government contributes 16 l. per annum towards its support; and the rest of the miserable pittance allowed to this lazar-house is derived from the Jewish kahal, and from private charity.

In one of the suburbs of Minsk I found twenty-five families of Tartars, whose ancestors have been residents here (they say) for several centuries. No doubt they are a remnant of prisoners taken in some former wars betwixt the Poles and the Tartars. They still retain the Mohammedan religion and dress, and have their own mosque and mollah. We found the latter at their place of worship; but what was my surprise, on interrogating him in Tartar, at finding that he did not understand this language at all, though he spoke both Russ and Polish! He said, that their ancestors having espoused Polish women, the succeeding generations soon lost all knowledge of the language of their fathers. Tartar colony, in the heart of Russian Poland, supports itself principally by gardening. They raise great quantities of vegetables, which they daily dispose of in the city market: and on further inquiry, I find that they have the character of being a peaceable well-behaved people. The mollah seemed to be but little versed in the doctrines of the Prophet of Mecca. He begged me to furnish him with a Polish Testament, as he could make no use of the Tartar one which had been sent to him. I accordingly complied with his request.

Minsk is an ancient Lithuanian town, situated on the River Swistoche; sometimes subjected to the Principality of Polotsk, and at others to that of Smolensk. So early as 1066, the two sons of the Grand-duke Iaroslaff besieged it, took it, massacred all the males, and distributed the women and children as slaves to the warriors who accompanied them. In 1104, a Russian prince, named Gleb Vseslavitch, reigned here, who afterwards became Prince of Polotsk. Its fortunes were for many ages united with those of Poland, of which kingdom it formed the capital of a Palatinate; but was taken by the Russians in 1656. It is now the seat of Government for the province of the same name, and of a Russian archbishop, who takes the title of Archbishop of Minsk and There is also a Roman-catholic Bishop of Lithuania. Minsk. The Jews form two-thirds of the population. At the last census there proved to be 8000 Jews, and only 4000 Christians of all denominations, in the town of Minsk. Many of the public buildings are of brick; but the houses of the inhabitants are chiefly of wood. There are a number of manufactories of hats in this place, which are thence exported to every part of the interior of Russia.

The country round Minsk is fertile in grain and pasturage. Extensive forests of pine still cover a great part of the province, the felling and transporting of which down the rivers, to Cherson in the east, and Königsberg in the north, form a principal branch of the industry of its inhabitants. They are reckoned at upwards of two millions of souls; and consist of Lithuanians, Poles, Jews, and Russians. I dined at the President Leipsky's, with a number of Russian and Polish nobles; where we had much conversation on the state of the Jews, circulation of the Scriptures, condition of the people, &c.; after which we attended a Committee of the Bible Society, and I spent the evening with the archbishop.

Our points of discussion were, the invocation of saints. use of pictures in worship, and several others of a similar nature; against all of which I gave his eminence my strongest reasons, backed by the declarations of the inspired volume. Anatolie, like several other Russian and Greek prelates whom I have conversed with on these subjects, did not allow that a belief in such points was absolutely necessary to salvation; yet he contended that they were useful institutions of the Church; and, by way of apology for them, brought forth a number of ingenious reasons to prove that it was impossible to believe, for instance, that such a saint as the apostle Paul in heaven should now no longer take any interest in the prosperity of the Church on earth; and that if his prayers availed for it while upon the earth, in heaven also they must equally avail;—that as to the unlawfulness of using pictures in worship, which he styled "the books of the ignorant," he maintained that such was the constitution of the human mind, that we could not understand what, for instance, we read in the Gospels before we had formed to ourselves mental pictures of the narrated acts of Christ and His Apostles. But, like the Metropolitan Platon, he fully acknowledged the abuses which were daily made of these by the people; and that many of them, from ignorance, verily worship not only the saints, but also the boards and colours.

In most of the towns I have visited in White Russia, a comfortable inn is not to be found. The traveller there, as in Poland and in the interior of Russia, must make up his mind to encounter every privation in this respect, and be glad if, on the road between provincial towns, he can procure any thing better than black bread, milk, eggs, beer, and common brandy. On this account the country nobility generally carry their provisions with them when on a journey, together with a cooking apparatus, and even bedding; but in the Government towns they provide a sufficient quantity of white bread, poultry, wine, &c. to supply them till they reach the next town.

In Minsk, I found every thing very dear. I had to pay six roubles (five shillings) per day for a single room at the inn, and for every article at a proportionate rate.

I had another opportunity of meeting a number of the distinguished Poles of the town, at the table of one of the nobles. They shewed me much attention and civility, and promised to help forward our cause; but there was not a man amongst them of whom I could say that I believed him to be truly interested in it. They have it in their power, however, either to impart the Scriptures to the vast population of this province, or withhold them; and, for the sake of others, I felt desirous of making use of their influence as far as possible, in aid of the best of works.

The spirit of national rivalry and enmity betwixt the Poles and the Russians is still strongly cherished in secret, and manifests itself in a variety of ways: the Polish ladies, for instance, I was told, refuse to dance with Poles who have become officers in the Russian regiments: and this deep-rooted national enmity against the Russians is daily nourished in the family circles and private associations of the Poles.

AFTER a fatiguing day's labour, I left Minsk about half-past six in the evening, though the weather was very unfavourable, and took the road for Wilna. But at midnight I was compelled to stop a few hours at a post station, on account of the severity of the storm: so boisterous were the winds and rains, that I was in the greatest danger of being overturned in my calash. Towards morning it somewhat abated. The hurricane tore up by the roots and broke down numbers of trees in the woods, many of which we found lying across our path the next day. We travelled the whole day amidst torrents of rain, and arrived in Wilna about midnight.

After a few hours sleep, I prepared to visit the promoters of the Bible cause in Wilna, with whom I had formed the Society two years ago. Count Plater Sieberg, one of the Vice-Presidents, gave me the details of the unceasing efforts of the Jesuits against it; and the hurtful effects produced by the Pope's bull, zealously propagated by them. The Countess, his lady, a good Roman Catholic no doubt, observed, in conclusion. "that. in her opinion, it was their duty to obey the will of the Holy Father." Both from the pulpit and the press the Society is furiously attacked by the agents of Rome. One of them, a Professor at the University here, named Galianski. had published a pamphlet in reply to the query, "May every person read the Bible?"—which is said to have done harm. The Governor-general. Rimskoy Korsakoff, I found still very favourable to the cause; and, as far as his influence extends, it is applied to help forward the work. However, in reply to the pamphlet of Galianski, Mr. Martinofsky has translated Dr. Van Ess's work into Polish, proving, by extracts from the Writings of the Fathers of the Church, that every one ought to read the Holy Scriptures. An edition of 1000 copies of this valuable pamphlet is in the press, and will certainly do good. By these discussions, many, I trust, will be led to examine for themselves; and the cause of Truth, instead of suffering loss, will ultimately gain by them.

The Committee had, during the two years of their existence, collected about 6000 roubles, and circulated 800 copies of the Scriptures; of which, 300 were Polish Testaments, which the University took for their schools.

The town of Wilna is built among sand-hills, at the confluence of the two streams Villia and Vilika. It was founded in 1305, by Guedemin, grand-duke of Lithuania; of which it afterwards became the capital. Many remains of ancient public buildings, both in and near the town, bear ample testimony to its former grandeur. In 1748 it was burnt down; and at that time, it is recorded that 13 churches, 1 synagogue, about 146 shops, 25 palaces, and 469 stone houses, &c. &c., were reduced to ashes. Still there are, at the present time. many fine churches, and public and private buildings in Wilna, and daily improvements are still making. The present number of inhabitants is about 40,000: of whom one-half are Jews. The Roman-catholics of different orders here are diligent in attempting to convert the Jews. One morning, two decent-looking nuns, dressed in grey, called upon me, and most earnestly begged that I would assist them in a case of extreme difficulty. Jewish maid, about fourteen years of age, had left the house of her parents, and taken refuge in their convent, requesting to be instructed and baptized. The parents. finding out the place of her retreat, had made application to the police, to oblige her to return; contending, against the nuns. that she was not yet of age, and therefore incapable of judging for herself. The girl threatened to destroy herself, if again delivered up to her parents; and the request of the nuns was, that I should intercede with the governor-general in their behalf.— On conversing afterwards with his excellency on this occurrence, he was inclined to think, with me, that until the girl was of age she was obliged to be subject to her parents: but he knew of no law applicable to this singular case; and he promised to investigate further into the circumstance.

The Jewish population seem all engaged in buying and selling; the men hawking their goods about the public places, and the women, seated before their shopdoors, knitting stockings, and loquaciously inviting the passers-by to purchase of their wares. They all dress in the fashion of the Polish Jews; the men, with black silk or stuff long robes, in eastern style, girt upon them, and round caps turned up with fur, with bushy beards and long hair, shining with oil and curled; the females, somewhat more European in their attire, with rich head-dresses, ornamented with mock or real gems, according to their ability. The great majority of them look dirty and ragged.

In no country are the Jews so numerous and national as in Poland. Wherever I have found this unhappy people, whether among the civilized nations of Europe or the uncivilized tribes of the Turks and Tartars, their religious state seems to be marked by the grossest ignorance and superstition, or by systematic infidelity. Among the poor, the Oracles of God delivered to their fathers have long since been superseded by the incoherent fables of the Talmud: while a cold-hearted Deism has overrun the higher classes of the Jewish nation:the former, hearkening to the commandments of men who have set aside the Law of God, "are turned unto fables;" while the latter have joined the self-named philosophers of modern times, in rejecting not only Christ and his Apostles, but in denying the Divine legation of Moses also. A time, however, is predicted in the Word of God, in which the vail shall be taken from off the eves of this forlorn people, and more Scriptural and conciliatory means used to bring them into the fold of Christ than have ever yet been employed: for, notwithstanding the inauspicious facts which I have stated relative to the religious and moral state of the Jews in general, there are, even at the present time, various intimations of a more favourable state of mind towards Christianity existing in many of them. The great change which is now working in the moral and religious state of all nations, by means of the translation and general dissemination of the Word of God-the success attending the preaching of the Gospel among the Heathen, particularly of late years—the falling-off of numbers of the Jews from their rigid attachment to their former superstitions, and founding new temples for a reformed worship in the modern tongues—the lessening of their prejudices against Christianity—the lessening of the hatred and prejudices of Christians against the Jews-the circulation of the New Testament in the Hebrew tongue among them-and the great desire which many Jews shew to obtain and read the Holy Scriptures—the state of despair respecting their ever receiving a Messiah, such as they desire, which I have everywhere observed to prevail, less or more, among the reflecting part of them—the fact, that many Jews of late, from conviction, have embraced the Christian Religion-all these unusual signs conspire to prove that an important crisis in the religious state of the Jews is fast approaching; for the Apostle assures us, that "they also, if they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted into the Church." In the present contracted kingdom of Poland, they are reckoned at about half a million; and in all the southern provinces of Russia, viz. Wilna, Grodna, Bialastock, Minsk, Witepsk, Mogileff, Jitomir, Tschernigeff, Kief, Podolia, Cherson, Ekaterinoslaff, Bessarabia, Moldavia, and Tauridia, at a moderate calculation, their numbers amount to upwards of one million and a half more: so that under the Russian sceptre there are at least two millions of Jews. exact time of their first settlement in these countries is not known; but they all speak a corrupt German, except the Caraim in the Crimea, who speak Tartar. is believed that they originally came from Germany; and that the principal emigration took place in the time of the Crusades, when they were often exposed to great persecution, especially in the cities on the Rhine, from the fanatical armies on their passage to the Holy Land. Boleslaus, prince of Kalish, bestowed on them their first privileges, in 1268; which were greatly augmented by Casimir the Great, in 1338.

At present, the Jews here and in Poland possess great influence; which they have partly acquired through their riches and partly through their numbers, and the unhappy changes to which these countries have been subject during the last century. In one sense, therefore, the Jews are more powerful in Poland than the Christians; for though the landed property is still in the hands of the nobility, yet the gold, silver, and commerce, are chiefly in the possession of the Jews: they farm the taxes of every kind, keep the public inns, distill and sell brandy, and monopolize the sale of salt, corn, and other products of the country; and are unanimous in their efforts to bring down their Christian neighbours; in dealing with whom, when they have it in their power, they pay little regard to justice and truth. They also rent many of the estates belonging to the Polish nobles; which gives them an opportunity, too often, to oppress the poor peasantry.

The Polish and Russian Jews are divided into different sects: the chief of which are:

First, The Karaites, or Caraim, who are of very ancient origin. Their distinguishing principle is, that they reject all traditions and oral laws, and hold strictly to the literal sense of the Five Books of Moses. On this account there reigns an implacable hatred between them and the Rabbis.

The second sect is called Chosidim, Zealots, peculiar to Poland. This sect took its rise about fifty years ago, in Podolia, from a fanatical Rabbi, who gave himself out for a prophet. They reject the study of the Mosaic Law altogether, and resolve all matters of faith and practice by Kabala. Their property is common, and at the disposal of their chiefs, whom they dignify with the name of infallible; and who, in return, taking advantage of their ignorance and superstition, govern them by the mystical decrees of the Kabala. This sect is said to be spreading among the Jews in these provinces; but in Austria and Prussian Poland it is strictly prohibited.

A third sect are the Frenkists, a kind of Judaico-They originated from one Frenk, a Rabbi, Christians. who came from Constantinople into Podolia about the year 1740, and gave himself out for the Messiah; but on his being called to give an account of himself before an assembly of Christian bishops and priests, in the cathedral church at Lemberg, he lowered his pretensions, embraced the Christian Religion, confessing that Christ was the Messiah, and saying that he was His Messenger. The Empress Maria Theresa is said to have looked upon him as an apostle, destined to bring his brethren over to Christianity; and therefore granted him her protection in Moravia, where he made a number of Joseph II. however considered him more proselytes. as a deceiver than a Christian, and at last, in compliance with the petitions of the Jews in Brünn, drove him out of Frenk then took up his residence at his dominions. Offenbach, near Frankfort on the Maine; whither many of his Polish converts followed him, with all their riches. Here he continued to rule over them to extreme old age: but after his death, the greater part of his followers returned again to Poland. From all I have been able to learn about this singular character, it appears that he gained over numbers of superstitious Jews to follow himself; but few, if any, to follow Jesus Christ. The most of the Frenkists of the present day are, properly speaking, neither Jews nor Christians; and the more ignorant of them still expect the resurrection of their deceased apostle!

Exclusive of these three chief sects, the great body of the Jews in Poland are under the government of their Rabbis and Scribes, who exercise an aristocratical These Scribes and Rabbis are a authority over them. distinct body: they are instructed from their infancy in their religious and civil laws, of which they afterwards become the interpreters. Their office differs but little from that of the Scribes and Pharisees of ancient times. They are held in great respect among the people; being not only their supreme judges in civil and religious matters. but also their physicians, exorcists, and public teachers: hence they know the secrets of every family, influence all that is going forward, and unite in themselves a despotic temporal and spiritual power over the people. All their prayers and religious services are performed in They learn to read and understand the Old Testament, by the assistance of a translation made into Jewish German by Ben Athius, written in the Rabbinical character, and printed at Amsterdam.

The senior pastor of the Lutheran Church at Wilna, Nicholai, informed me that he had baptized several Jews, whose conduct since has given him great satisfaction; but that, after their baptism, they were so severely persecuted by the other Jews, that they were forced, at last, to leave the country.

The fear of this persecution has made many of the Jews apply to him, at different times, for secret baptism; and has occasioned still more of them to stifle their internal convictions in favour of Christianity. He told me, however, that he had always refused to comply with their desire of secret baptism, judging it inconsistent with the commands of Jesus Christ. Indeed, such is the awful persecution to which a Jewish convert to the Christian faith is exposed from his brethren in Poland, that it is almost impossible for him to live longer among them. The enmity of the Rabbis extends so far, that the young convert, particularly if poor, is not only deprived of every means of gaining a livelihood among his Hebrew kinsmen, but is in the greatest danger of his life.

I was much gratified with my visit to the institutions for public charity in Wilna, which I found in a better condition than those of any other place visited during my tour. We began with the Workhouse and Almshouse, under the direction of the Wilna Philanthropic Society: a very large oblong square brick-building, two stories high. In this institution we found 360 persons. young and old; of whom, all who could work were employed, as weavers, hatters, joiners, locksmiths, and in other trades. The produce of the workshops is brought into one common magazine, and sold to the public for the benefit of the institution. Neatness and order seemed to prevail throughout this large establishment. It is supported principally by the contributions of the inhabitants: and I was informed that the ladies of Wilna have divided the city into districts, and go from house to house collecting, once a year, for this institution.

Our next visit was to the Hospital of St. Jacob, under the direction of twelve of the Roman-catholic nuns, called "Sisters of Mercy." These twelve middle-aged females have upwards of 150 sick to attend to, night and day, in this hospital. They dress the wounds of both men and women, and administer medicine and every other help to the sick and dying. The order and cleanliness which prevailed in the wards was truly delightful to behold. The beds of the invalids, their dress, the furniture, floors, walls, the purity of air, all bore ample testimony to their indefatigable labours.

The Hospital for the Jews, which we next saw, formed a perfect contrast, in all these particulars. There were 116 patients in it. It is supported by their own society; but its funds, amounting to upwards of 10,000 silver roubles annually, are said to be ill administered.

The Foundling Hospital is also under the care of the Sisters of Mercy. They had 100 girls and 40 boys in it. The latter we found in school, learning reading and writing from a master; but the girls were in a large room, and engaged in different kinds of needle-work. In another apartment, called the nursery, were about fifteen wet-nurses, and double the number of babes. However, the nuns are said not to pay the same degree of attention to the children as to the aged and sick poor.

The City Hospital, which we next visited, contained 150 sick, of both sexes, classified according to their diseases, and under the direction of fifteen of the Sisters of Mercy. The abbess, an aged respectable-looking matron, conducted us through the wards. Every thing connected with the sick seemed, if any thing, in a still better condition than that of the St. Jacob Hospital. This, together with the other two hospitals described, under the care of these humane Roman-catholic nuns, are said to possess extensive revenues from lands and other property, by which they are principally supported.

In a lunatic asylum, under the care of a monk of the order of Boni Fratrum, we found ten patients. None of them were in chains, or confined in any other way; save an aged Jew, who was in a solitary cell.

Possibly, information had been given to most of these institutions that a stranger would visit them, and consequently every thing might have its best side turned towards him: but, even making full allowance for this, and judging not merely from what I saw, but also from general report, these institutions are admirably conducted, are a blessing to the city, and do great honour to those who superintend them.

The City Prison consists of three upper and two lower apartments, in an old monastery. In these five small rooms I found 140 prisoners; of whom fourteen were females, occupying the fifth room. The male prisoners seemed the most daring villains I ever set my eyes upon, even in such receptacles of criminals. Here was no classification, and no occupation for the prisoners; but I found a Slavonian Bible and a Polish Testament among them, which bore marks of having been much used. On entering one of the upper rooms there was a great stir among the prisoners, a theft having just been detected among themselves. How different the looks of these men from those of most of the prisoners in the interior of Russia! and what a striking confirmation of what I have often had opportunities of remarking, that in proportion to the degree of civilization among a people, their criminals appear to be more audacious, and hardened in their evil propensities! A bad heart, joined with a cultivated intellect, becomes, by that very cultivation, more fruitful of crime than that of the savage or demi-barbarian. How important therefore, when instruction is given, that not merely the enlightening of the intellect, but the amelioration of the heart, through the Gospel, should be constantly aimed at!

I sent them an additional supply of Polish Testaments; and also a Hebrew one for the Jews, some of whom, before my leaving the prison, fell at my feet and earnestly begged for it. For the sixteen kopicks allowed each of.

them per day, they have two-and-a-half pounds of bread. In point of order and cleanliness, the hospitals and prison form a perfect contrast. My conductor, the police-master, told me that a plan for erecting a new prison had already been made out, and sent to Petersburg for the sanction of Government.

I made particular inquiry of the Protestant clergy here respecting the number and state of their congregations. Subject to the Lutheran General Consistory of Wilna, there are—

The Rev. Mr. Renshinsky, senior, of the Reformed or Calvinistic Churches in Lithuania, a venerable old man, gave me the number of their churches at twenty-one; but several of them are shut up for want of attendance, and most of their congregations are greatly reduced. The number of the ministers is about twenty, who meet in synod annually in Wilna, to regulate the affairs of their congregations. But he stated, that most of the latter were so poor, they could do very little for the support of their ministers. This was derived principally from the rents of lands left to the Reformed Churches by the family of Radzevil, which afforded to each a stipend of about 25l. per annum.

Two years ago, an edition of 5000 Testaments in the Samogitian language was prepared for the Roman Catholics who speak that tongue. The translation was made by Prince Gedroitz, bishop of Samogitia; and it was printed here, in the Monastery of St. Cazemir, by the monks. The distribution of this Testament forms a principal object of my visit to Samogitia.

The Samogitian language is spoken in three districts of Lithuania, by a population of 112,000 souls, mostly Roman Catholics, for whom the above version has been made. Twenty copies of this work I procured, to take with me as samples, and for occasional distribution.

Taking leave of my Wilna friends, who have shewn me much hospitality and kindness, especially the governorgeneral, at whose table I have been a daily guest, I directed my course towards Troki, the ancient residence of the grand-dukes of Lithuania, which lies about twenty miles to the north-west of Wilna. We reached this district town, which is beautifully situated on the Lake Bressal, in the evening. This lake has a communication with the River Villia, by a canal. The ruins of an ancient ducal palace are still prominent on one of the little islands which spot the bosom of this extensive lake, whose waters are clear as crystal. Troki is said to have been founded by the grand-duke Gundemin, in 1321. It was burnt down in 1390, and ruined by the Russians in The present town is divided into three parishes. In one of the churches is an image of the Virgin, which annually attracts a number of pilgrims from the surrounding country. The houses of the inhabitants are built of wood. The scenery around the lake is remarkably fine, in a country like this, where the eye is so seldom relieved from the sameness of prospect, of extensive plains and woods; and the evening being fine, I greatly enjoyed it.

In the suburbs of the ancient town of Troki I paid a visit to a colony of Karaite Jews, who have inhabited this delightful spot for several centuries. On entering the house of the chief Rabbi, I saluted him in Tartar, and, to my astonishment, was answered in the same language. None of them could speak Jewish German, the common language of all the Polish Jews. I inquired whence they originally were: the answer was, "From the Crimea;" that they and their ancestors have resided in Troki for nearly four hundred years; and that they possess very distinguished privileges from the ancient dukes of Lithuania and kings of Poland.

I asked them whether they still had intercourse with their brethren in Dschoufait Kale. They replied, that they not only visited them, but also were visited by them. The Tartar language is still the only one spoken in their families, though most of the men could speak both the Russian and Polish. They are neither dressed like their brethren in the Crimea, who have retained the Tartar costume; nor like the Polish Jews, but like the common Poles and Russians. The number of the Karaites in Troki is about 160 souls.

Before I had finished my inquiries relative to these particulars, the house of the middle-aged Rabbi was filled with his brethren, who were all anxious to know who the stranger was, and what his errand. Our conversation then turned upon the signs of the times, and the coming of the Messiah, which lasted upwards of an hour and a half. I stated the truth to them as clearly and as forcibly as possible. The Rabbi defended his position, with the Old Testament in his hand, that the Messiah was still to come; but having no Talmudic interpretations to screen himself behind, he was soon

Messiah must needs have come, I spoke of the purity and spirituality of the Gospel, and of that eternal life which is revealed in the doctrines which Christ taught. They replied, that they had heard that such a translation existed, but that they had never seen the Hebrew Testament. I then inquired, whether they desired to see it. They all replied, that they should be very happy to get a copy of it. By this time, my calash and servant, with fresh horses, were before the door. I took out ·five copies of the Hebrew Testament, and presented the Rabbi with the first. He seemed to gain new animation at the sight of it, and accepted it most willingly, embracing and thanking me for it. I then gave a copy to the merchant, who seemed no less overjoyed, and was warm in his expressions of gratitude. Now the difficulty was, how to distribute the remaining three. All hands were stretched out; and every one cried, "O! let me have one also!" I was greatly embarrassed. An interesting young man stood near me: several times he stretched out his hand, as if eagerly desiring to grasp the third copy, which I held in my hand; and as often he abruptly drew it back again. I read in his countenance a strong combat between civility and desire. To him I gave the third. His countenance now shone with gratification and joy, and all present loudly approved the act. fourth and a fifth I bestowed on two other of these They all commenced reading with interesting people. great avidity, and, before I left them, gave me proofs of their understanding well what they read. I told them that I hoped in a short time to hear of their having formed themselves into a community of believers in the Lord Jesus, founded on the glorious truths of that blessed volume which I had just put into their hands. Amid loud expressions of gratitude and wonder, I left the house of the Rabbi, bade farewell to this truly interesting little people, and proceeded on my journey. merchant did not part with me, however, so soon: he walked with me upwards of a verst, up the border of the beautiful lake, whose surface, with the charming surrounding scenery, was gilded with the rays of the evening He put many questions to me respecting the signs of the times, and the spread of the Gospel; and left me with these words: "I believe that some important crisis with our people is at hand: what it is, I cannot say: God will direct all."

After parting with this intelligent man, I crossed the hilly country to the north of the Lake Bressal, by a very narrow and difficult track; and about ten in the evening happily regained the post-road to Covna. To the keeper of the post-horses I gave a Hebrew Tract: he also was one of the Karaites. These people have a fair moral character in the country around: most of them are employed in trades and merchandise. We continued to travel the whole night, and reached Covna to breakfast.

COVNA.—This ancient town, finely situated for commerce at the confluence of the Villia and Niemen, bears numerous marks of depopulation, poverty, and decay. The pavement of the market-place is nearly overgrown with grass, and many of the public buildings seem hastening to ruin. The population does not exceed 4000, of whom a great proportion are Jews, and the rest Roman Catholics. The pastor of the few hundred Germans still remaining in the place told me that he should be obliged to leave his people, because they could not support him. He complained of the Roman Catholics, as being excessively intolerant, and great enemies to the diffusion of Gospel light among their people. A decree of the Russian Government, prohibiting all traffic betwixt Germany and Russia through this city, has depopulated and ruined it, notwithstanding its many advantages as a frontier mart.

From Covna we continued to travel down the banks of the Niemen for about twelve versts; when we changed horses at a village swarming with Jews, with whom I left a Testament and a few Tracts. At Srednik, another populous Jewish town, I conversed with the people for an hour, and gave them two Hebrew Testaments and a Hebrew Tract. We prosecuted our journey all night, northward, till about four in the morning, when we arrived at the district town of Rossiena. With some difficulty I obtained a room in the house of a Jew, where I attempted to get a few hours rest; but the place was so cold and uncomfortable, that I felt not at all refreshed by it. On inquiry after those persons in authority to whom I was recommended. I found some of them absent; and those with whom I had an opportunity of conversing seemed exceedingly shy and indifferent to the cause: they spoke of the circulation and reading of the Holy Scriptures as things forbidden and sinful; and they acted accordingly.

Rossiena is chiefly inhabited by Jews; and is now but an insignificant-looking place, though formerly the residence of a Voivod under the Poles. It looks more like a village than a town: the houses are mere wooden huts, and most of the streets not even paved. The Samogitian population of the district of Rossiena amounts to about 90,000. The Pierist Monks have a College here. I called upon them; and was civilly received by one of their Teachers, who spoke French. They have 220 boys in their school, the sons of the surrounding Schleachti or nobility. It was Sunday evening when I paid this visit.

Hearing music and dancing in a house opposite, I inquired what that meant: "O!" said they, "these are our scholars, preparing to pass their school examination to-morrow." The Pierists knew nothing of the Samogitian Testament, nor of its translation. I called, next. on the Dominican Monks, whose monastery is rather a fine building-indeed, the only one in the town. The abbot was shy, and cold: he assured me that they stood in no need of Bibles; and that as to the peasants, they had no time to read them. He even smiled at the idea of a poor peasant attempting to read the Bible, as a thing quite out of character with his situation in life!-"Again," objected he, "our peasantry have no money to buy them." I replied, that the Samogitian Testament only cost fifty kopicks (2s). "No, no," said he; "give me a number, gratis, and I will dispose of them as I think proper."

While thus conversing with the superior, several of the monks entered, dressed in their white camlet robes, sleek, and puffing with the exertion of ascending the stairs. All of them looked very suspiciously at me; and seemed to say, "What has this heretic to do among us?" I left them without gaining my object; for though the superior promised to send to me for a copy of the Samogitian Testament to examine, and then to order a number from Wilna, yet, as he did not keep his word in the first instance, I had no reason for believing that he would in the second. The bishop of Samogitia has his residence here; but he was absent at Polangen, where I hope to meet with him.

In the evening, I had a long conversation with a Jew, who is rich, has travelled much, and boasts of being a free-thinker. He puts the Old and New Testament, Moses and Christ, upon a level: "Both of them were distinguished for their wisdom: they were wise men, but." in his estimation. "nothing more." The state of the Jews, in the provinces which I have visited formerly belonging to Poland, is much the same everywhere. They abound in every town and village: great ignorance, poverty, and vice, prevail among them. Bound together by deep-rooted prejudices and common sufferings, it is difficult for them to look upon the interests of the people, among whom they dwell, in any other light than as opposed to their own. No doubt their debased state in society, with their national and proverbial vices of low cunning, imposture, and every species of circumvention, are the natural effects of the treatment they have for so many ages experienced, from men of all nations and religions. Nor does the contemplation of their religious state amend this unfavourable moral picture: while the lights of Christianity and of science have daily been dispelling the general gloom which brooded over the most favoured nations of antiquity, the Children of Israel, with the followers of the Prophet of Mecca, have remained nearly stationary as to religious and scientific improve-There have been some few exceptions; but these have generally been on the side of infidelity. the present day, there are many learned Jews who have no faith in the divine origin either of the Old or New The Jews are not even permitted to know Testament. the purity of the Old-Testament doctrine; for the people are studiously kept in ignorance of it by their Rabbis; and the foolish fables and traditions of the Talmud have long since supplanted the doctrines of Moses and the Prophets, while infidelity and cold-hearted Deism have overrun the more-refined and civilized ranks. remember to have met with a true Mohammedan, or a strict Jew, living under a Christian Government, who considered himself otherwise than in a state of bondage—a stranger in a foreign land. The few examples which probably might be adduced, of Mahomedans and Jews who have distinguished themselves in the service of Christian princes, prove nothing against the general fact here stated; for most of such characters, on examination, will be found to have been quite indifferent to the subject, or destitute of all religion.

On returning from the Pierists in the evening, I found a party of rope-dancers performing, before a crowd, in a yard opposite my lodgings; and I understand, that betwixt the hours of eight and eleven there was a play acted by four Jews, at which the most notable of the Hebrew public were present.

24th, St. John's Day.—A great holiday, and also a fair in this place. The peasantry are flocking towards it from all quarters, many of them respectably dressed; and civilization seems to exceed, by some few degrees, that among the lower ranks in the interior of Russia. No doubt the proximity of Germany is the cause of this; though the language of the Samogitians is very different from that of either the Russians or Germans.

In my intercourse with the Jews here, I gave them five copies of the Hebrew Testament, which I hope will be read by some. I also left copies of the Samogitian and Hebrew Testament with the Sheriff, who promised to circulate them, and to recommend the cause to the Marshal of the district, on his return.

Leaving Rossiena about mid-day, I took the road for the district town of Shawel. At a village called Titifian there was a fair similar to what we had left at Rossiena. In the evening, we found the roads filled with the country people returning from it, among whom I was pained to observe a great number intoxicated. I even became doubtful of my safety in travelling by night through extensive and little-frequented woods: yet we continued our course in the rain, along very bad roads, for about fifteen miles; and then halted, about midnight, at a Samogitian village, where I proposed resting a few hours: but the heat and vermin in the hut were so annoving, even though I merely stretched myself on a bare bench by the side of the wall, that I could not sleep. The rain continued till morning. Since leaving Minsk, we had had but few days of fair weather. About three in the morning I got up, as much fatigued as when I lav down. One of the females who belonged to the family being able to read Samogitian, I gave her a Testament; which was received with great joy, and I doubt not will be read and listened to with profit. How delighted they seemed to be, when they heard her read in the Gospel the words of Jesus Christ! At last the mother of the family came, and kissed and blessed the hand which had bestowed the invaluable gift. I had only brought twenty copies with me, to give to such as engaged to promote the cause in the chief towns: but I could not resist the artless eloquence of the poor peasant who had brought me so far in the rain, to give him a copy also: "For," said he, "though I am unable to read, yet my wife is a good reader, and reads her prayer-book fluently; and how happy she will be to get the Gospel added to it!"

The general aspect of the country from Covna to Rossiena is level; the soil, sandy and clayey by turns; and extensive districts are covered with fir. The crops of rye and wheat look but indifferent, for the advanced season of the year.

We arrived in the district town of Shawel about eight the next morning. It consists of 280 dwellings: mostly wooden huts, of different dimensions; the rest of brick. I found the Jews, who form the majority of the inhabitants, extremely shy, and averse to conversation on religious subjects. They seemed poor and wretched; and complained of their temporal wants being so pressing, as to leave them no time to think on spiritual subjects. They are not even able to support a Rabbi; and one of them told me, that it was customary with them for the father to circumcise his own sons.

The German Protestant Minister of the place was absent at Mittau. The number of the Protestants is very small: they have no church, but assemble in the house of their pastor, seldom more than twenty-five in number.

To the Mayor of the town, M. Minietoff, I had an introduction from Count Sieberg. I explained to him the object of my journey; and gave him copies of the Samogitian, German, and Hebrew Testaments, together with our last Report in German. He seemed to be well-disposed, and promised to co-operate. He complained much of the prevalence of Freemasonry in the country, and said that it was spreading rapidly in all the Polish provinces united to Russia; that most of the nobility belonged to these lodges; and that in Rossiena a new one had been opened very recently. The Archbishop of Minsk informed me that a lodge had been opened in that town also. Both he and the Mayor of Shawel deeply suspected the object of these secret combinations.*

In Shawel I visited the district prison—two small

^{*} The Emperor Alexander, well informed no doubt of the political tendency of these lodges, suppressed Freemasonry throughout his dominions, by an ukaz, in 1822; and demanded an oath from every servant of the crown, that they neither did nor ever would belong to such fraternities, in or out of Russia.

apartments, containing about eighty prisoners. Poor wretches! the space in which they were seemed to me not large enough for them to lie down: they looked haggard, pale, and sickly. How miserably accommodated have I found the inmates of the district prisons, in most of the Governments I have visited! At the sight of so much misery, nakedness, sickness, want of room, scanty supply of food, and promiscuous combination of criminals of all ages and sexes, the heart sickens and becomes sad.—The Samogitian population of the district of Shawel is about 75,000 souls, all Roman Catholics.

On leaving Shawel, I took the road for Telsh, another of the district towns of Samogitia; at which I arrived about one in the morning.

On approaching Telsh, the level and uninteresting aspect of the country undergoes a favourable change, becoming undulating, and in some parts even hilly. the Mayor of the place, who is a Russian, I presented my letters of introduction; and at once found a most hearty welcome for the object I had at heart—the circulation of the word of God. The Poles are so ignorant on this subject, and, being Roman Catholics, so prejudiced against the reading of the Scriptures, that it was only after reasoning and persuasion that I could get even the better classes of them to allow that the object I was travelling to promote was a benevolent and good one. The prejudices of the Russians, on the contrary, were in favour of the cause of Scripture distribution; and they found no scruples of conscience, created and nourished by their priests, unfavourable to the principle, that it is the duty and privilege of every Christian to peruse the sacred volume for himself.

The Mayor and others in Telsh assured me of a fact, which will scarcely be credited—that the princes of the family of Gedroitz are so numerous, and so poor, that some of them gain their support by cutting fire-wood, and carting it to the Wilna market for sale. Many of them cultivate the ground for their livelihood. So low is the princely dignity fallen in Lithuania! And as to the state of the nobility of Samogitia, it is also degraded beyond conception: even in the district of Telsh there are not fewer than 700 individuals of noble descent, who cultivate the ground with their own hands!

The number of houses in Telsh is 160; of which one half are inhabited by Jews, who are mostly very indigent. I paid a visit to their synagogue; and was not a little surprised to observe the Ark, in which the Law is preserved, adorned with figures of birds and beasts, carved in wood; probably a sort of imitation of the Cherubim. I conversed with the priest some time; but found him ignorant, and incapable of much thought. Indeed, I have found it a most difficult task to rouse the reasoning powers, in persons who have never been accustomed to look upon things but in one way, or to compare opinions with opinions. I have even met with numbers of persons whose minds were so dormant, that the clearest evidence seemed to make no impression on them.

In the Bernardine Monastery I found sixteen monks, fat and fair; and as the weather was rather warm, several of them were seated at a table, regaling themselves with lemonade. Their superior was civil to me, and seemed to be aware of the object of my visit. He asked me what I really thought was the true cause of the extensive efforts now making, in so many nations, to disseminate the Scriptures in all languages. I referred him to Matt. xxiv. 14; with which answer he appeared much satisfied; and said, "Certainly this was the doing of the Lord." He promised to assist in the circulation of the Samogitian Testament. In the district of Telsh the Samogitian inhabitants are reckoned at about 58,000.

Throughout Lithuania, among the Roman Catholics, the middle and higher classes alone seem to receive any regular education. Yet the Marshal of the nobility, and several other persons of note, assured me, that a considerable proportion of the common people can read, and that much good may be expected from the introduction of the Testament among them. The schools are exclusively in the hands of monks of different orders. The Bernardine monks of Telsh have about 200 boys, sons of the schlechtitsi or nobility, in their school, whom they instruct in Latin, French, German, and Samogitian, with the usual branches of general knowledge.

Having obtained the promise of the principal official persons that they would assist in the distribution of the Testament among the poor Samogitians, I left Telsh, and took the road for the frontier town of Polangen. About five in the evening we reached Kritingen, the seat of Prince Zuboff; upon whom, having met him at the Governor-general's at Wilna, I called, and presented him with a Samogitian Testament, as a specimen of what I was desirous of seeing circulated among his numerous peasantry in the neighbourhood; also two Hebrew Testaments for the Jews of Kritingen, and one for a Rabbi at Plungen, whom the prince spoke of as a man of learning. I arrived at Polangen in the evening; and was glad to learn that the Bishop of Samogitia, whom I had expected to find in Rossiena or Telsh, was there.

I waited upon the bishop, presented to him my Letter from Prince Galitzin, and met with a very kind welcome. I informed him of my proceedings, in travelling through the country. He said that he had not yet begun to circulate any of the 1000 copies which he had reserved for himself. I related to him the particulars of my transactions in the district towns; and prayed him to support my endeavours, by writing to the District Marshals, and also to the chief of the clergy. He approved of the arrangements which I had made with several of the principal persons, in the towns through which I had passed; and promised to write to the Marshals, begging them also to render all possible assistance. He said that the number of churches among the Samogitians was 200; and that he would request the Committee in Wilna to send a certain number of copies to each of the congregations, for sale and distribution: this he conceived would be the most eligible way of bringing the 4000 copies into immediate circulation. bishop paid for the paper and printing of the whole edition, and then made the Russian Bible Society a present of 4000 copies, the Petersburg Committee resolved to sell the copies for half a silver rouble each (about two shillings in English money), which is the price of the binding.

I was invited to dinner by his Eminence. Several other gentlemen were present, who made many inquiries relative to the progress of the work in which I was engaged. The bishop promised to lose no time in putting the above resolutions into execution; so that I trust the object of my wearisome and difficult journey through Samogitia will effectually be gained.

On board the Negropont, in the Black Sea, Nov. 10, 1819— Arrival at Odessa—Confinement in the Quarantine—Translation of the New Testament into the Modern Russ—Testimonies of the Russian Bishops to the utility of the work—Labours of the Russian Bible Society—Description of the Quarantine—Emancipation from it.

Nov. 10,1819—On board the Negropont, in the Black Sea. 11th.— We are passing the mouths of the Danube, with a strong easterly wind. About midnight, a fog overcast the horizon, and the master and pilot began to look rather fearful. At 2 o'clock p.m. the sea was running high and wetting the decks, yet now and then the sun peeped for a moment through the gloom. At 5 o'clock the sun set, red as blood—the wind strong, and the whole scene presaging a stormy night. Our pilot estimates our distance from Odessa at about fifty miles. In coming from Constantinople hither, only 300 miles of latitude, we have exchanged summer for winter.

12th.—The roaring of the sea and the darkness of the night are now past, and we are in sight of land. The cracking and rolling of the vessel, labouring against a heavy sea, prevented all sleep. Each wave threatened to make every joint in her give way: the noise below was terrible. About 9 o'clock the wind fell, and we were soon enveloped in fog from the land. Every change of wind or weather seems to revive the fears, and agitate the breasts, of the mariners. No wonder; for the navigation of the Black Sea in the month of November is considered a most dangerous undertaking, especially on its western and northern coasts, on account of the shallows near the mouths of the rivers, and the heavy storms and fogs from the east, so common in this sea in the winter months. When the Black Sea was entirely in the power of the Turks, its navigation was deemed so perilous in winter, that it was forbidden to sail from any port in it between the 26th of October and the 23d of April.—At 10 o'clock, we again got sight of land; and at 11, the domes of the churches of Odessa came into view, at about twelve miles distance: but the wind being boisterous and contrary, we spent the day in beating up the shore, and at 6 in the evening cast anchor four miles from land.

13th.—Set sail early; and after struggling against a strong north-west wind for several hours, we cast anchor in the roads of Odessa, about 10 o'clock in the forenoon; having been five days on our voyage from Buyûkdere, a distance of about 340 miles. We were then ordered on shore by the officers of the Health Office. After examination as to the health of each, I delivered to the captain of the port my Letters of recommendation from Baron Strogonoff to the Governor-general, Count Langeron, requesting to be admitted into quarantine without delay; and returned on board.

About 2 o'clock, permission was given; and I went on shore with my servant and baggage; and before 3 we were lodged in a cold, damp cell, in the Quarantine, and the iron bars bolted to prevent our going out. A prison indeed! *

^{*} They are obliged to be very strict, and have no respect of persons; as the plague is not only raging in Constantinople and Smyrna, and different other parts of Turkey, but is almost at their doors, having lately broken out in Bessarabia.

The Quarantine occupies a large piece of high ground, half a mile above the port: it was formerly the fortress of Odessa. It is enclosed partly with stone walls, and partly with wooden fences, well guarded all around by military sentinels. The Lazaretto consists of a row of thirteen small stone apartments, one story high; the entrance to five of which is from the north side, and to six from the south, with one at each end, in order the more completely to separate the inmates from one another. The cell which I occupy with my servant is only sixteen feet by thirteen, and ten feet high; with two windows, four feet by two each. A common Russian oven, made of brick-work, in one corner, with two dirty bedsteads, and a fir table three feet by two, composed the furniture of the cell. We found it very damp and cold the first night; but the second day we made considerable improvement, by heating the stove, stopping up the holes in the floor to keep out rats and mice, and ordering provisions, &c. from the town. Adjoining the cell is a small place for cooking, and a wooden bedstead for my servant: and before our prison-door is a court twenty-two feet by nineteen, with stone walls on each side about ten feet high; and a railing in front, of the same height, resting on a stone breast-work two feet and a half from the ground. This small court, being thus closed in on every side, is usually damp, and the free circulation of air is prevented: in wet weather, it becomes a pool of stagnant water, to the great annoyance of those confined in the cells. regulations of the institution demand forty-two days' confinement, allowing the traveller to retain all his clothes and baggage by him; or fourteen days, on condition of stripping naked on entry, and parting with every thing you have brought with you. Your goods and apparel are in that case taken away by condemned criminals, and hung up in the pack-house, to be exposed to the air forty-two days. Most persons choose the latter term; and we, after two days' consideration, did the same, having received clean clothing, bedding, &c. from the town. But there is a third method of precautional purification; viz. to steep the articles of dress, linen, &c. in water-woollen clothes forty-eight hours, and linen twenty-four; after which they are delivered to the owners to dry, and are considered pure. A sentinel is stationed in front of the cells through the day, to prevent any intercourse between the prisoners; and on his leaving at sun-set, the officer comes round, and locks all up for the night. They are not opened again till 9 o'clock next morning; and for the first eight or ten days of trial they are kept constantly shut. During our confinement, which lasted seventeen days, we were generally shut up sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. My servant prepared for me soup and boiled meat every day; and this, with tea morning and evening, constituted our support. These articles are supplied by a privileged merchant, who makes the inmates pay a high price for what they receive. The Count Langeron, the Archimandrite Theophil, and several other members of the Committee of the Odessa Bible Society, visited me during this period; and shewed me as much attention and kindness as the suspicious circumstances in which I had been placed at Constantinople (six weeks, in the midst of the plague) would admit. After ten days' close confinement, I was permitted to walk out now and then, for half an hour, about the fortress, under strict injunctions to beware of going near any one; as this would oblige me to share the period of confinement of the person with whom I came in contact, whatever that might be.

On the fourth day of my confinement, the archimandrite brought me a printed copy of the Four Gospels in the Modern Russ. My joy was great, at the sight of this new luminary to enlighten the numerous body of the Russians. But as this Translation forms a new epoch in the ecclesiastical history of Russia, and as every thing connected therewith must on this account become interesting, I have taken great pains to make out the following faithful translation from the original Address, in which three of the greatest dignitaries of the Russian Church announced the reason for undertaking this work.

" INTRODUCTION.

"By the Word of God all things were created, and all created things are upheld by the power of the Word of God.

"The Word of God is unto man an incorruptible seed, by which he is regenerated from a state of nature into a state of grace: it is the bread by which he spiritually lives, and the water with which he quenches his spiritual thirst: it is a light shining in a dark place, until the day break, and the dawn arise in his heart: and it is the light of the day itself, or the living and blessed knowledge of God, and of His wonders in time and in eternity. Without the Word of God, man is in darkness, is hungry and thirsty, and spiritually dead.

"The Word of God being thus indispensably necessary to the true and best existence of man, the all-gracious God, who from the beginning of the world, at different times and in divers ways, spake unto the Fathers by the Prophets, hath in these latter days spoken unto us by His hypostatic Word, His Only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ: and in order that His Word, which was at certain times revealed only unto some, might be made

"When the Hebrew nation was prepared to be entrusted with the written word of God, then the holy Books were opened, but only in the Hebrew language. This was originally the case with all the Books of the Old Testament. But when, according to the fore-knowledge and fore-ordination of God, the time came for dividing the treasure of the Divine word among other nations, then also, even before the coming of Jesus Christ into the world, the Hebrew Books were translated into the Greek language: and after this, when the holy Books of the New Testament appeared, they were no more in the Hebrew, but in the Greek language; because this was more generally understood than others in those times, and therefore best adapted to the dissemination of the Word of God among all nations. To this dispensation succeeded the pastors and teachers of the Church of Christ; and, by the translations of the holy Books, the word of God has, from ancient times, sanctified many languages, among the number of which is our national Slavonian.

"But though a language may be preserved in books for many generations without a change, yet in the mouths of the people it undergoes many changes, even in a single age: hence, that which was written in our native tongue several centuries ago is but little understood by us in the present day, unless we study the language in its ancient state. Herein is clearly seen the necessity, not merely of translating the Holy Scriptures into the vernacular tongue of a people, but of renewing the translation from time to time, in accordance with the state of the language and its usage among them, in order that the word of God may be in continual circulation and use. This necessity was long since seen by our ancestors, who, in transcribing the Slavonian Holv Scriptures, not unfrequently changed many words which were no longer in use, for such as were, and even sometimes for other words more agreeable to the original text. Those who desire it, may soon be convinced of this. by comparing ancient manuscript copies of the Sacred Writings in Slavonian with manuscripts of the same or of a still more ancient date. St. Alexies, metropolitan of Moscow, is worthy of particular esteem for labours of this kind, of which we cannot here be silent: whose Slavonian copy of the Holy Gospels, carefully revised according to the original Greek, is still preserved in the Tschudoff Monastery of Moscow; where his body also The language now spoken by the Russians differs so much from the Slavonian used in the ancient translation of the Holy Scriptures, that, in order to render the knowledge of them more easy to the people, it would not suffice to change a number of obsolete words for such as are now adopted in their stead, but it is necessary to make a new version altogether, according to the present grammatical principles of the Russian language.

"His Imperial Majesty, with his usual penetration, has clearly pointed out this want, in his edict to the Holy Synod of the 23d of February 1816.—According to this most gracious will of our pious monarch, and with the sanction of the Holy Synod, and in accordance with the voice of present circumstances and the long-expressed desire of many lovers of the Word of God, the Translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Russian language has been undertaken; and with a view not to exhaust the patience of the pious until the whole work

"Christ-loving Readers! without ascribing any thing to human aid, and trusting in the power of the Word of God, we can verily say that this is a very favourable time to embrace it; and that in our days, the door of the Gospel is opening unto many nations much wider than hitherto. Read, hearken, believe, fulfil, become wise, and be saved! Pray also to God in behalf of those engaged in the work, that He may bestow and increase light and strength, so that we may be enabled rightly and uninterruptedly to continue and finish our work.

- " MICHAEL, Metropolitan of Novogorod and St. Petersburg.
- "SERAPHIM, Metropolitan of Moscow and Kolomna.
- " PHILARET, Archbishop of Twer and Kashin.
- "St. Petersburg, March 30, 1819, O.S."

Let us now hear how the labours of these three learned and pious prelates have been received by their clerical brethren in different parts of the empire. Anatolius, archbishop of Minsk, expresses himself on the subject, in his Letters to the Committee, as follows:—

"Though the Slavonian language of our church-books be very near the Russian, yet there is still much, even in the very Gospels, which remains unintelligible to many persons, on account of their not being accustomed to the Slavonian phraseology; and from this cause the Sacred Truth could not have its full effect on the hearts of the readers. This obstacle is now taken away. May this new fruit of the labours of the Bible Society become a token of the renewed grace and power of God, unto the salvation of the Russians!"

Ambrosius, bishop of Kursk, expresses himself thus: "This important phænomenon on the horizon of the Russian Church, worthy of the golden age of the most pious of the Russian monarchs, resembles the rising dawn which shall precede that glorious day of light, when all men shall read the word of God, and when the simple, (and even children,) to whom especially the words of Eternal Life are addressed, shall understand; from whom, until now, this sacred spring has been almost sealed up by the antiquity of the language. May the Almighty prosper this auspicious commencement, and bring the work to a blessed termination!"

Eugenius, archbishop of Pskoff, one of the most learned of the Russian prelates, says—"The utility of this version is evident and sure, not merely for the common people, but also for the clergy themselves, their instructors. The long and earnest desire of many for its appearance, is a proof that it will tend to the still further dissemination of the Divine word in the hearts of believers."

Ambrosius, archbishop of Kasan, remarks: "That which is most pleasing in this matter is, that even the old ceremonialists, from whom the greatest opposition to this work was to be expected, approve of it. When they visit me occasionally, and I explain to them the utility of this translation, and read to them some of the difficult Slavonian passages which they do not understand, and then the Russian translation (by which the unintelligible becomes intelligible to them), they unanimously praise this sacred undertaking. On this account, I doubt not but that it will produce salutary fruit in due season."

translation are seen the excellency and riches of the Russian language: it is pure, and easy to be comprehended: it explains the Slavonian text: and hence the benefit which must arise from it, to all who desire to walk in the way to eternal salvation, is most evident. Now, the Russian also may read the Gospel of Christ in the Russian language, and clearly and purely understand the whole counsel of God, set forth in His word; and, having understood it, may rejoice in His salvation."

Such are the sentiments of five of the Russian Bishops, on reading the Gospel in their native tongue. Nor were the joy and gratitude of the laity less evident for this invaluable gift. "Yes," says a distinguished individual, "we will pray to God that he may send His help from on high, to the translation of the other books of the Sacred Scriptures into the Russian language. The work is great; its utility is inexpressible; it forms an epoch eternally to be remembered. Posterity will pronounce with admiration and with awe the name of the Emperor Alexander."

Having been long absent from Russia, and having received but little information, especially during the last ten months, respecting the actual progress of the Russian Bible Society, I was not a little astonished and encouraged on reading a small pamphlet on the success of the Bible cause in Russia during the year 1818, published by the Petersburg Committee. What glorious results of six years' labour are the following! One hundred and seventy-three Bible Societies in the Russian empire: Three hundred and seventy-one thousand six hundred copies of the Holy Scriptures, printed or printing in twenty-five languages and dialects; of which copies, One hundred and twenty thousand one hundred and five are already in circulation. The Receipts of the Society have been 1,361,499 roubles and 2 kopicks; and their expenditure, 1,244,362 roubles and 29 kopicks.

Nov. 29—This is the seventeenth day of my confinement; yet, such was my need of rest, after the dangers through which I had passed in Turkey, and the many months of great mental and bodily exertion during my travels in Greece, Italy, &c., that the time has not hung heavy upon me. This is the fourth time I have been subject to quarantine imprisonment; yet, though in many respects I am miserably circumstanced. I never before passed through a quarantine with so little weariness: so much more does our comfort depend on the state of the mind, than on external things! My heart has been so filled with gratitude for past mercies, that I could have been happy any where: so that my prison, with its humidity, bare walls, confined air, iron bars, and many privations, has been a place in which I have enjoyed great peace and tranquillity of mind; for which I most sincerely bless God.

Among the books which I read during that period, was Dr. Marheinecke's "Geschichte der Deutschen Reformation," in 2 vols. This work principally consists of extracts from the numerous writings which appeared during the time of the Reformation; and also from Luther's own correspondence, and those of his friends, in regard to that great event. I was sometimes not less struck with the passionate, railing language of Luther against his opponents, as I read it in all the unseemly nakedness of the original, than with the strength of his mind and arguments against a system of debasing deception, corruption, and error, which he and his coadjutors so successfully combated and overthrew.

After undergoing an examination by the physician belonging to the establishment as to the state of my health, I was informed that I should be set free the next day.—But it may perhaps be useful to give a few more particulars respecting the manner in which matters are conducted in the Quarantine of Odessa. The goods which require purification are exposed in four large stone warehouses, each one story high, and situated at some distance from the Lazaretto, upon the shore; and the apparel, &c. of individuals, in several packhouses, not far from the house in which we are confined. A few days after I had given up my books and clothes for purification. I desired the Commissioner to allow me to see them; and, to my no small annoyance, I found my clothes hanging upon the same wooden spar with the apparel of a Greek merchant newly arrived from Smyrna. I remonstrated with the Commissary; and represented to him the danger to which he was exposing me, by mixing my clothes with those of individuals who had come from a place where the plague was rife. He excused himself by saying, that they had too little room in the packhouses, and but few people to turn the clothes. Their custom is, to take in the wearing-apparel and effects of passengers from different ships and places, until the warehouse is full; and then the term of fortytwo days' cleansing begins. A condemned criminal is employed to hang them up on long spars that run the breadth of the houses, about fourteen inches apart: he also turns them several times a week: and at the expiration of forty-two days they are pronounced clean, provided the said criminal remains free from infection.

Passengers are only admitted twice a week—on Tuesdays and Saturdays; and they are discharged from quarantine on the same days. Ships arriving with cargoes from any port of the Mediterranean, or from the opposite shores of Asia Minor, must ride eight days' quarantine in the roads before they are admitted into port, or the passengers into quarantine. In the port or harbour there is free intercourse among the ships, but no intercourse with persons on shore. Every day, at noon, they come to the Parlatoria, and converse with the merchants to whom their cargoes are consigned, or from whom they are to receive cargoes, transact their business, purchase provisions, &c. &c., so far as all this can be done without coming in contact with each other. Articles of food, such as flesh, bread, cheese, butter, vegetables, fruits, with all liquids, are not deemed to be infectious.

Those persons who enter the Lazaretto on the same day, though from different ports and arriving in different ships, are permitted to have intercourse with each other. The Greek merchant and his servant from Smyrna, as also an Armenian priest and his servant from Constantinople, having entered at the same time with myself, I was told that I might have intercourse with them if I chose, for that we should be liberated on the same day: I refused, however, to make use of this permission, expressing to the officer my surprise at such a regulation.—Every ship in the roads and port has a soldier placed on board, from the day of its arrival till it sails. These poor men are thus exposed to the disease; but when they and their officers are relieved, they only stand twenty-one days' quarantine, and are then allowed to pass, with every article they may happen to have got on board of the ships. I strongly remonstrated with the principal officers against this great breach of consistency. They allowed it to be inconsistent; but excused the practice by saying, that there were but few men granted them, in comparison to the duty required; and that, for this and other reasons, they were obliged to liberate them at the expiration of half the number of days appointed for passengers and sailors.

About eleven in the forenoon, I was conducted from my cell down to the Quarantine Council; where I received my discharge, and removed, with several friends who came to welcome me, to lodgings in the town. I felt grateful to God for my preservation during such a trial of my health; being not yet quite recovered, when I entered the quarantine, from a severe indisposition which I had suffered at Constantinople.

Dec. 2.—Odessa is a rising city: not fewer than 400 houses are now being erected. It is here called the "Refuge of Nations," on account of its singularly mixed population, consisting of emigrants from all countries— Russians, French, Italians, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Germans, Poles, Turks, Tartars, Americans, English, &c.—all eagerly prosecuting their commercial concerns in this free city, where they enjoy many distinguished The number of inhabitants is about 24,000 privileges. within the gates, and 16,000 in the vicinity. garden, laid out in the English style, is a favourite resort of the citizens in fair weather. This is an excellent place for seeing the singular and interesting variety of Asiatic and European countenances and fashions; but the European costume seems to predominate.

As this city is much indebted to its late patron, the Duc de Richelieu, who enjoyed the full confidence of the Emperor Alexander, and in the course of a few years adopted very comprehensive and judicious plans for the enlargement and improvement of the city as well as for the extension of its commerce, the French have acquired considerable influence here.

The town consists chiefly of stone buildings two stories high, the streets and public places being laid out in modern style, broad, and flanked with rows of trees, which prove a most agreeable shade from the scorching rays of the sun in summer: many of them have gardens and orchards attached. But the stone with which the houses are built is far from being durable; it is a conglomeration of shells, and so porous, that the air blows through walls two feet thick, unless they be plastered. On this account they retain the frost in the winter, and become moist, and liable soon to decay. Want of good water is another great inconvenience in Odessa. are draw-wells in different streets, but they are very deep, and the water is hard and brackish; and to obtain good sweet water, the inhabitants are obliged to fetch it from two springs, one seven and the other twelve versts distant from the town.

The streets are still unpaved; and are so spacious, that I was informed it would take more money to pave them, and the public market-place, than all that has yet been expended on the buildings of the town*. The inhabitants speak of their climate as being good, but very trying to delicate constitutions, in consequence of the purity and keenness of the air. The weather also, in winter, is changeable: a few days ago we had ten degrees of frost (Reaum. 8° F.); and to-day we have floods of rain, and the streets almost impassable with mud. The dust of the streets is annoying beyond conception, through the whole summer. I experienced this when I was first here, in June 1816: and as the town stands rather high upon the shore, every breath of wind from sea or land raises the dust in clouds, and sifts it into every apartment, through the chinks of the doors and windows. The inhaling of this calcareous earth must be very prejudicial to health.

As this town has been declared a free port, it will naturally become a principal mart for European and Asiatic wares, both raw and manufactured, for the South In 1803, the customs received are said not to have amounted to more than 30,000 roubles; and now they are upwards of one million. The principal article of export is corn; varying in quantity, according to the produce of the crops in Egypt, and in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. From 300 to 400 ships can lie in the harbour, and load and unload at once. But so long as the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus remain in the possession of the Turks, the commerce of Odessa must be subject to great fluctuations. already been sufficiently experienced by its merchants. since its foundation in 1796. For instance: when I was here two years ago, the price of wheat was from 40 to 45 roubles the tschetvert; but it has been selling this year for 9 and 10 roubles!

The corn to be exported is brought on four-wheeled carriages, each drawn by a pair of oxen: they come in large caravans, from the provinces of Podolia, Volhinia, Kief, Cherson, and Ekaterinoslaff. In summer, every street and open place is filled with these caravans. This extensive inland carriage is almost exclusively in the hands of the peasantry of Little Russia.

Fuel is a very scarce and dear article in Odessa, as the country around, to the distance of some days' journey, is quite destitute of wood of every kind; hence firewood and charcoal are very expensive, being brought down the rivers from the interior, and then by sea to Odessa. As a substitute, the poor use dried dung, and the larger stalks of vegetables and herbs that grow wild in the open steppes. But bread, and butchers' meat of all kinds, are excellent, and at a very reasonable price; and as the German, Bulgarian, and Russian colonists, settled in the neighbouring steppes to the number of from 50,000 to 60,000 souls, succeed in their horticultural and agricultural labours, vegetables and fruits will become more abundant for the supply of the city, and of the ships which visit the port; for the climate and soil are well adapted to such purposes. But every thing here is new; and though, as a whole, it bears the features of comprehensive plan and great energy of execution, yet at the same time the marks of imperfection and of the failure of anticipated success are also apparent in different parts.

The other ports on the Black Sea belonging to Russia are Ovidiopol and Otchakoff on the Danube; Nicholaief and Cherson on the Bug; Eupatoria, Kerch, Enical, and Theodosia, in the Crimea. But Taganrog, on the Sea of Asoff, is, after Odessa, the most considerable port for commerce on these two southern seas.

The principal articles of import are cloth, cottonstuffs, Turkish shawls, wines, oil, tobacco, fruits, and a kind of incense called ladon, which is much used in the churches.

In addition to grain, the exports consist of iron and copper, ropes, tallow and candles, linen, furs, butter, and caviare. But in proportion as the commerce of Odessa increases, that of the other ports above mentioned seems to decrease.

Several great mercantile houses here have of late failed; among others, that of C-. This was one of the richest houses in Odessa, when I was here in 1816. At that time I called on Mr. C., and invited him to take an interest in the Bible cause, and to assist at the formation of the Odessa Society, with which I was then occupied. Mr. C. turned round upon me, and, with that infidel freedom in his manner and address which one sometimes meets with, in those who suppose that the tower of their fortune and their philosophy stands strong, said-"Indeed, Mr. Pinkerton, I have so much to do with the present world, that I have no time to think of a future one!"-Poor man! a few months after these words were uttered, misfortune followed misfortune, in the midst of which he was taken ill and died: and his house has since gone to wreck. How insecure is the tenure of all earthly things, and even of life itself! This remarkable instance of reverse of fortune, and of sudden removal from the world, (the more striking when taken in connexion with the conversation above recorded.) has repeatedly been alluded to in my presence, by gentlemen who knew the circumstances at the time when they took place.

Having obtained the permission of Count Langeron to examine the state of the prison, I went thither, with an officer as my conductor, and a Greek gentleman of my acquaintance. A common building, situated near the Police-office, is used as a prison, there being no establishment of the kind yet prepared by Government. The Count was not very willing that I should go near it:

and no wonder; for I found it one of the most wretched places of the kind that I ever visited. There were 131 criminals and debtors in three apartments on the ground floor; but so confined was the space, that, as the captain informed me, during the night there was absolutely not room for them to lie down, however close to each other, on the wooden benches placed around the walls! In a fourth room we found fourteen criminals. with irons on their legs; the air was very noxious. the apartment for females we found only three, and a boy; the rest were out at work. The floors and walls were dirty, the prisoners ragged and unhealthy. We next entered the debtors' room: about twelve were in it. several of them Jews; but the place was so confined, and the air so offensive even here, that it was with difficulty I could stay in it, even for a few minutes.

I strongly remonstrated with the Count on the abuses I had observed in the quarantine, and still more on the wretched state of the poor prisoners. He promised to do something for their relief; and assured me that the foundation of a new prison was to be laid next spring—the plan being made out and approved, the site chosen, and funds already allowed for the purpose.

The Town Hospital is situated on high airy ground, near the Cherson-gate. It is one of the best buildings of the kind, that I have yet met with in any of the provincial towns. It is divided into wards, each of which we entered: pure air and cleanliness prevailed throughout. The number of sick and superannuated was eighty-six: the inmates of the sixth ward were exclusively of the latter class. The bath, kitchen, bed-clothes, &c., were not indeed so clean and neat as those of the Hospitals in Wilna under the Sisters of mercy; yet the establishment, taken as a whole, was in a very respectable condition. I made arrangements for supplying the prisoners and the sick with the Holy Scriptures, and strongly recommended the lamentable condition of the former to the benevolence and compassion of several of the clergy, and other gentlemen belonging to the Bible Society.

The Odessa branch of the Russian Bible Society, which I had the pleasure of seeing planted on the shore of the Euxine in 1816, has brought forth fruit; though the Jesuits here have exerted themselves in no ordinary degree, with a view to root up this tender plant: they succeeded in drawing away many of its first supporters, of their own creed, during the first year, and expected to see it soon wither and die; but they have been disappointed, for the Lord has raised up other labourers, of a better creed; who, with a degree of zeal and perseverance which does them no small honour, have dug around and watered it.

The Society has turned its attention to the spiritual wants of the poor German colonists: of whom there are 4572 in the neighbourhood of Odessa, divided among four parishes, and settled in ten villages, mostly without pastors; in Bessarabia nearly 10,000, settled in fourteen villages, had only one pastor, instead of three, among them: three villages in the Crimea were without any spiritual guide at all. Their superintendant, last week, examined into the state of the Holy Scriptures in two villages of the vicinity; and among 275 families he found seventy without a Bible! There are also several villages of German Protestants on the River Malochina, in Little Tartary, without a pastor. It is not easy to conceive what a blessing is conferred on these families, when they and their schools are supplied with the word of God; for they are literally as sheep scattered in the wilderness, without a shepherd.

The number of Roman Catholics, chiefly Germans, who are colonized in the vicinity of Odessa, is reckoned at about 6000 souls. The Jesuits had the spiritual charge of them. A settlement of 600 of the same profession in Bessarabia had a Capuchin monk over them. Another class of colonists in the vicinity are Bulgarians, about 5500 in number, who are described as industrious and prosperous: they belong to the Greek Church, and are all of Slavonic origin. Several hundred Bibles and Testaments have already been circulated among these foreigners, in the immediate neighbourhood of Odessa, by the Society; but these are few, when compared with the wants both of their families and of their schools.*

All these foreign colonists enjoy special privileges. granted to them by the Government. In the year 1721, Peter I., by ukaz, granted to the Swedish prisoners their freedom, in order that they might settle in Russia, purchase lands, erect manufactories, and engage in every other kind of trade. In an ukaz of Catherine II., in the year 1763, the rights of foreign colonists are more particularly defined. They enjoy religious toleration, are free from all taxes during from ten to fifteen years, and they and their children are exempt from civil and military services. The German colonists in the neighbourhood of Saratoff, upon the Wolga, amount to about 60,000 souls. The Moravian colony of Sarepta, which is also on the Wolga, near Tzaritzen, has existed for upwards of fifty years: it consists of about 500 members. On the shores of the Sea of Asoff there is a large colony of Armenians, who have erected the flourishing town of Naktschivan, which, with five villages in the vicinity, contains a population of about 15,000 souls: a large colony of Greeks also is found on the same sea, at and near the town of Mariapol; of whom 3000 live in the town, and 20,000 in twenty-two villages in the vicinity. These colonies of Armenians and Greeks were brought out of the Crimea by Catherine II., on that peninsula's falling under her sceptre. The late emperor, moreover, has granted permission to foreigners to settle on the lands of the nobility, with ten years' exemption from taxes, and with the liberty of removing when they please.

^{*} The Odessa Bible Society has contributed about 12,000 roubles to the funds of the Parent Society; and brought into circulation 1576 copies of Bibles and Testaments, in different languages.

Among the above-mentioned German colonists in the neighbourhood of Odessa, there are a few families of the Wurtemberg peasantry, who arrived here in the autumn of 1817, on their way to the neighbourhood of Mount Ararat, where they believe that the personal reign of Christ will soon commence. A few particulars of the history of this extraordinary migration may prove useful, as a warning to those in our own day who listen to the cry, "Lo! here is Christ; or, Lo! He is there:" I therefore scruple not to insert them.

In the month of January 1818, I met with the two leaders of this sect, in Moscow, where the Imperial family was then on a visit. They had come as a deputation from their brethren in Odessa to the Emperor Alexander, petitioning for help. Their names were Koch and Frick; uneducated men—yet they seemed, in a certain sense, to be well versed in their Bibles, and gifted with lively imaginations and considerable argumentative abilities; so that I was not unfrequently touched with their remarks, and delighted with the rich and natural imagery which they blended with their conversation.

The account which I obtained, partly from themselves, and partly from others, of this enthusiastic religious movement, was as follows. The meaning of the prophecies touching the Millennium had, during the last twenty vears, been much discussed by several pious writers among the German Protestants. Of these, the late Professor Jung-Stilling, of Baden, seemed peculiarly gifted, by his natural and acquired abilities, by a poetic imagination, genuine piety, and highly popular style of writing, to become a leader. His Exposition of the Book of Revelation, "Siegs Geschichte;" his periodical work, called "Der Graue Mann;" his "Heim-Wehe." with several other religious and mystical works, were for many years in the hands of every one who retained any regard for evangelical truth; for, though they were the channels through which he disseminated, in connexion with the leading doctrines of the Gospel, many wild opinions respecting Universal restitution, the non-eternity of Hell-torments, the applicability of Christ's merits to the salvation of heathens and unbelievers in another world, animal magnetism, &c. &c., yet they also contained most powerful and popular arguments, in defence of the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures against the attacks of the Neologian literati and clergy of Ger-This man fixed the time for the appearance of Christ, and the introduction of His millennial reign upon earth, sometimes at one period, and then, as events seemed favourable or adverse, at another. Among these dates, 1816, or 1836, were considered peculiarly weighty: and as the first is already past, his numerous friends at the present day, scattered throughout Germany, Switzerland, and Russia, are looking forward to the second with excited anticipations. The latter date, however, is the period fixed upon, not so much by Jung, as by Bengel of Wurtemberg; one of the most learned, pious, and successful expounders of the Apocalypse that has ever written on the subject. He was born 1687, and died 1752.*

But Professor Jung fixed not merely the year, but also the place where the Saviour should commence his personal reign; viz. beyond the Caucasus, between the Caspian and the Black Sea, near the original cradle of the human race. And the whole subject, and the prospects connected with it, laid such hold upon the minds of multitudes of religious people in different parts of Germany, especially in Wurtemberg and Bavaria, that nothing could prevent them from selling their lands and houses, and migrating towards the place appointed for the New Jerusalem, and the personal reign of the Saviour upon the earth.

The protection which the Emperor Alexander gave to the Bible and Missionary Societies, and his known Christian benevolence and piety, pointed him out to these people as the forerunner of the Saviour, who was to prepare His kingdom and gather together His people. As such, they celebrate his praise in their hymns or triumphant songs, under a variety of adulatory names and allusions.

Numbers of these Millenarians have settled in different parts of the south of Russia, within the last ten years; but the last swarm was by far the most numerous, consisting of upwards of 7000 souls. Having disposed of their immoveable property in their native land, they placed their families and effects on rafts upon the Danube, and sailed down that river, past Ratisbon, Vienna, Presburg, and Belgrade, with flying colours, singing Millennial hymns, until they reached the Black Sea. But such were the difficulties which they had to encounter in their passage, that before they reached this city and had passed the quarantine, the greater part of their property was consumed, and nearly 3000 of their numbers had fallen victims to this wild project, through disease, privation, and fatigue! For the preservation of the remainder, the two elders above mentioned came to Moscow, and laid their distressing case before the Emperor; who generously granted them money, and a guide to conduct them across the steppes in the south, and through the mountains of Caucasus, into Georgia, where he gave orders to the Governor-general to allow them to choose a district to settle in, out of the extensive lands belonging to the crown.

Koch and Frick styled themselves and their followers "Zionites." They professed their belief in the universal restoration to God of all rational beings that have ever fallen—even of the devil and his angels; "otherwise," said they, "the evil principle must be stronger than the good - Satan stronger than God." They believed that this world will at last become the habitation of the saints for ever. All the beautiful similitudes and figurative language used in Scripture, and more particularly in Isaiah and the Revelation, respecting the glory of the latter days, the Heavenly Jerusalem. the reign of the saints, &c., they believe will be literally accomplished, during the personal reign of Christ in that earthly kingdom which they are going to establish. They affirmed, that in the parts of Germany which they had left there were upwards of 50,000 families ready to follow them! They put into my hands a small Collection of Hymns, written by Koch, in which the fervour of their imagination and the nature of their expectations are clearly marked. This Collection is entitled "Geistliche Gedichte und Gesänge für die nach Osten eilenden Zioniden, "Spiritual Poems and Songs for the Zionites hastening towards the East." Koch assured me that he had been inspired to write these poems and hymns; that God had put the thoughts into his mind, and that he felt himself compelled to write. Hereupon I turned to his companion Frick, and asked him gravely whether he believed this: he as gravely answered, that he did really believe them to be inspired!*

As to the Jews, they believe that they must first be restored to their own land, and Jerusalem rebuilt, before Jesus appear among them, "to turn away ungodliness from Jacob;"—that the time of their restoration is at hand, but their conversion not so near.

* In these religious rhapsodies, the most sublime and spiritual language of Scripture is adopted as the vehicle for conveying their peculiar opinions. Alexander is announced as "The protector of the believing flocks in the new kingdom of Jesus on earth."-" God has chosen Alexander to be the defender of Zion, to prepare a place of security for the Bride, the Church."—"Yonder, great grace and a foretaste of the Sabbath is promised when Jesus' reign begins; for now is the time when God will assemble His people."-" Hasten all, and flee away to the appointed place of rest in vonder foreign land, where God Himself is ready to begin the 1000 years of joy!"—" How many thousand brethren have looked for this Second Coming! They lived not to see it: this joy is bestowed upon us."-" Hasten towards the East, to the New Jerusalem! -This call is from the Lord Himself: hence we follow willingly:—not for a thousand worlds would I remain behind!"—" Amen! Lord Jesus, King of Glory, come! come! we wait for Thee!-Come with the reward! The set time is near for Thee to live upon the earth."-" The greatest promises in the word command us to flee towards the East."-" Now is accomplished the second petition" (in the Lord's Prayer).—" The wise prepare and flee out of this Babylon:—this Babylon shall be destroyed, according to Scripture" (Ezek. chap. 7) .- " From the East the sun shines: yonder is the place of refuge: yonder, joy and gladness await us; therefore the Christian hastens."-" Now the rose-bud opens: the times are fulfilled; and, as the two angels predicted, behold! Jesus comes in glory! Triumph! Triumph! Victory! And eternal, eternal Alleluia! Alleluia!"

The death of such numbers of their brethren, in a few months' time, seemed not at all to have damped their ardour. I used every possible argument to persuade them not to go into Georgia, but to settle in Bessarabia or Little Tartary, where they could live at peace, in a healthy climate, and enjoy distinguished privileges from Government. I described to them the prosperous state in which I found the 483 families of Menonites, near the Sea of Asoff, in 1816. I related to them my own sufferings among the tribes of Caucasus; pointed out the insalubrious nature of the climate: and assured them they were going to settle in a den of thieves and robbers, among tribes that live by plunder, stealing, selling of children, and bloodshed. But all this reasoning was to no purpose. They both exclaimed, when I spoke thus to them, "You roll a heavy stone upon our breast, when you attempt to dissuade us from our purpose." They were admitted to an audience with the Emperor, the reigning Empress, and the Dowager Empress: they also visited many of the nobility, during their stay.

Having attained the object of their visit to Moscow, Koch and Frick returned to Odessa, with relief to their suffering brethren; and early in the spring of 1818 they crossed the Caucasus, and settled down in seven villages on the banks of the Kur, at some distance from Tiflis. They had not been long in Georgia, before they began to discover that they had not found that paradisiacal region which they had fondly anticipated: such were the labours, privations, and sickness which they had to encounter in the establishment of their colony, that a vast number of them soon awoke from their fanatical dream, and not a few made shipwreck of Religion altogether. The Governor-general sent to the Authorities of St. Petersburg the most distressing accounts of the disorders which had broken out among them. Meanwhile, Frick died; and Koch was glad to flee from their reproaches, and take refuge in Sarepta on the Wolga; where, among the more solid religious opinions and practices of the Moravians, he is said to have bitterly lamented the part he had acted.

But the members of the colony being thus settled among uncivilized tribes, with whose language they were unacquainted, and left destitute of spiritual guides, ran great risk of becoming Heathens and Mohammedans, had not the Båsle Missionary Society taken compassion upon them, and settled some of their Missionaries as pastors among them.

Their sufferings, however, were not yet at an end; for in the late war between the Persians and the Russians, they were attacked by the enemy, treated in the most cruel manner, and their villages pillaged and devastated. On the 26th of August, 1826, early in the morning, 1000 Turkish and Curdish horsemen surrounded the Colony of Catherinenfeld, broke in at the gates, and commenced a scene of unprecedented violence and cruelty. Mr. Saltête, the missionary, describes it in these words:—

"Infants they tore from the arms of their mothers, and spiked them with their lances: wives and maidens they ravished: old men they tied to the tails of their horses, and dragged after them. Upwards of thirty young and old they butchered. The houses, corn-fields, and gardens, they burnt down; and depriving 250 families of house and home, turned the whole district into a desert; carrying away every article of value. But worst of all, they dragged 140 men, women and children, into slavery."

Another communication on the same subject gives the following details:-" No human tongue can describe the misery which, in the course of a few hours, overwhelmed the settlement. Some of the colonists, in attempting to escape, were caught with long cords, in the same manner as wild cattle. Whoever was thus taken was immediately stripped of his clothing, and either killed on the spot, or suffered to run naked away. children were bound together in couples, and then slung across the horses' backs, like articles of baggage. If any of them disturbed their persecutors by their cries, they were instantly dispatched, before the face of their parents. Every sense of shame, and every feeling of humanity, was extinguished in these barbarians: the brutal herds set no limits to their licentious passions. A young woman of acknowledged piety, in endeavouring to escape from the robbers, was fired at and shot in the spine; so that she instantly fell, and slowly expired, in the most excruciating agonies, on the ground. A man. whilst endeavouring to intercede for the lives of his wife and children, was murdered at the foot of a tree to which his wife had fled for shelter. The latter, with an infant at the breast, was spared; but with a bleeding heart she saw her two little ones carried away into slavery. Three girls, about fifteen years of age, thought themselves happy in having reached the river, at a distance of about seven or eight versts; when two Tartars overtook them, and cruelly wreaked their vengeance on two of them. Among the wounded who were afterwards taken up and attended to, was one who had his scull laid open, and was wounded in the back with no less than twenty-two thrusts of a lance. A Curd ordered another of the colonists to throw himself on the ground; in which situation he pierced him twice with a lance, in the same manner as fishes are caught by spearing in the water: another Curd hurled a large stone at him, so that he was eventually left half dead.

"The most deplorable situation was that of the poor captives, who were treated like brutes, and inhumanly butchered if they did not immediately obey the cruel orders of their plunderers. A part of them have been carried away and sold in Turkey, and the remainder are in slavery in Persia. The almighty hand of the Lord, however, preserved the lives of 240 persons; but upwards of thirty were put to death, and about 140 were carried away into slavery."

The sufferings of these poor creatures, and of those that have since been ransomed, as detailed in the journals and letters of the Missionaries, would add a volume to the known misfortunes and cruel treatment of Christian slaves, in the hands of Moors and Turks.

These few details are given, not with any view to expose or throw ridicule upon any class of men on account of their religious opinions, but merely to caution professed Christians in our day against following the dictates of a heated imagination, respecting times and seasons, and the mode of accomplishing unfulfilled prophecy, which it hath not pleased God to reveal: for if the imagination be once heated on these points, it is impossible to predict to what extravagances even good men will go, both in opinion and practice, before they learn, by bitter experience, a more sober way of treating these mysterious and important subjects. To reap spiritual advantage from the announcement of God's future judgments or mercies, as contained in unfulfilled prophecy, we need not fictions and dreams of fanaticism; and he who gives the rein to fancy in such matters, delivers his soul into the hands of an unfaithful guide, which, leading him into the mazes of enthusiastic error, may, if Grace prevent not, conduct him to everlasting disappointment and remorse. This has been the voice of experience, in all ages of the Christian Church; and such things are permitted to take place for our instruction, on whom the ends of the world are come.

But to return from this digression:—The principal School in the town of Odessa is the Richelieu Lyceum, where there are several able teachers, both foreigners and Russians, at annual salaries of about 60l. each, and where 250 youths receive a classical and literary education. One half of them live in the Institution, and pay about 481. each annually for board and instruction: the other half are day-scholars. Part of the pupils are prepared for becoming teachers. The building is large and commodious, and the order observed in the classes is exemplary. There is also a respectable Pension or Boarding-school for Young Ladies, and a Commercial School: not to speak of several other private schools for the children of the inhabitants. number of Churches belonging to the Russians is six. The Russians of the National Church, the Raskolniks or Dissenters from it, and the Native Greeks, have each a Protopope or Dean, at the head of their clergy here; and, judging from the assistance they have all three rendered the Bible Cause, and from the intercourse I have had with them, they seem to be well-disposed men, and to live on terms of mutual forbearance and friendship. The German place of worship is in a corn-magazine. The Roman Catholics have a church, and the Jews a synagogue. The number of stone houses in the town is estimated at 2200: the corn-magazines at 300. The Cathedral Church is a noble building, in the Grecian style, with domes and crosses. One day, I entered it when the protopope was baptizing an infant. The day was excessively cold, there being upwards of ten degrees of frost, and the water in the font almost freezing. After the ceremony was over, I expressed to the priest my surprise that they did not use tepid water, seeing the infant had to be three times immersed over head and ears in the icy bath. He smiled at my compassion, and exclaimed—"Ah, there is no danger! the child is a Russian." Indeed, such are the superstitious opinions of the people, that were the chill taken off the water, they would probably doubt the validity of the ordinance.

I shall here descend to a few of the customs and ceremonies attending the birth and baptism of infants, hoping they may prove interesting to the reader.—From ancient times it has been a custom among the Russians, which is strictly adhered to by all classes even in the present day, never to disclose the secret of a woman's being in labour, except to those who have to wait upon her, till the labour is past; from a superstitious belief that when her state is known, especially to strangers, her sufferings and danger are thereby increased.

Old experienced women were their only assistants until about the middle of the last century, when schools were established for preparing regularly-trained midwives. In addition to these legally-authorised midwives, now existing in every town of the empire, the College of Physicians, by an ukaz of 1796, are commanded to have an accoucheur in every provincial town, which is generally done. But the peasantry have a strong aversion to the help of a medical man on any occasion, and especially on these occasions: his assistance is therefore rarely sought for, even in cases of the greatest extremity: they rely most on the skill of their own self-taught practitioners, who have been known by the name of babki, even from the introduction of Christianity: and where these cannot afford help, whatever consequences follow, life or death, it is acknowledged by all that it was "volia Bojie," "the will of God," it should be so: and here the matter ends; no one thinks of accusing himself, either of having employed improper means, or for not having called in superior skill.

Special prayers are appointed by the Church to be read over women after delivery: and it is the opinion of the people, that if they have been in the apartment where a female has been confined, though they should not have come in contact with her, they are thereby defiled; and nothing will satisfy them, until the priest has read prayers over them for their purification. In consequence of the general idea of impurity attached to a lying-in woman, it is very common (as the huts of the peasantry seldom consist of more than one habitable apartment) to resort to the stable or bath-house: the latter is usually at a small distance from the dwelling:—even some of the middle classes still use the bath-house, in these circumstances.

It is scarcely to be credited what instances of strength they display on such occasions. Immediately after being delivered in the bath, the mother washes and dresses herself and her infant, and walks home to her dwelling, the babka carrying the child: or, if delivered in her own hut or stable, she immediately proceeds to the bath with the child, bathes herself and it, and returns again to her family! In consequence of this strong attachment to the Mosaic law of purification, a very strange custom is to be found among the more ignorant of the peasantry; which not even the arm of the ecclesiastical power, during the last hundred years, has been sufficiently strong to extirpate. In districts of the country where a priest is not readily obtained, to read the prayers of purification, a messenger is sent to him at a distance; and he reads them in his own house, over the bonnet of the messenger, naming the persons who are to be purified. On the conclusion of the ceremony, the messenger carefully closes his bonnet, returns with its imaginary sacred contents, and shakes them over the woman, her infant, and attendants!

Another singular superstition is still prevalent among them—that of not addressing children by their Christian names, especially in the hearing of strangers; from a fear that advantage might be taken of the discovery, for purposes of enchantment. Even in the present day, nothing exasperates a Russian mother or nurse more. than to praise a fine-looking child, whom you may happen to meet in the street in their hand or arms, or to inquire whether the child be a boy or a girl. The danger is considered to be less, if you mistake the one sex for the other; and if they condescend to give you an answer, it is sure to be with a view to mislead you: but at all events, after such an inauspicious encounter. they spit several times on the ground, repeating, at the same time, prayers against the effects of the evil-eye and all Satanic influences. If, after this, the child should seem restless, the nurse and mother take it for granted that the child is zaglazen, under the influence of the evil-eve. To remove this, various methods are resorted to: one of which is, to take a pot of water, and drop a piece of cold charcoal into it; the child is then washed with this water over the threshold, the nurse all the while praying for its deliverance from the charm.

It is still the custom to present gifts to the mother and to the new-born child; in imitation, they say, of what took place at Bethlehem on the birth of Christ, when the wise men from the East presented the new-born Saviour with "gifts—gold, and frankincense, and myrrh." In Little Russia, on the contrary, the parents send gifts to their friends on such occasions: for on the third day after the birth, the midwife is despatched, with presents of wine, bread, and dried fruits, to inform the relations and acquaintances of "shto Bogdall," "what God has given," and to invite them to the baptism. But on visiting the mother and infant, no presents are given in return.

In Great Russia, the child is baptized usually in the church or in a private house; and the prayers, exorcisms, and ceremonies attending this ordinance are long and complicated. The Greeks and Russians always use the trine immersion: the first in the name of the Father. the second in that of the Son, and the third in that of the Holy Ghost. When a priest cannot be obtained. they permit lay-baptism; and they never re-baptize, on any account whatever. The number of sponsors is not fixed: if the child be a boy, he usually has two godfathers and one godmother: if a girl, they provide two godmothers and one godfather: but there may be either fewer or more. It is forbidden to the sponsors ever to marry their godchildren; the sponsors even consider themselves as related to each other, in consequence of the conjoint obligations they came under on the part of the child.

In the Ukraine, or Little Russia, it is customary also to baptize by sprinkling or pouring water upon the body.

This change the Little Russians, many of whom are Uniats, adopted from the Roman Catholics, when they were under the power of the Polish Government. However, in cases of necessity, even in Great Russia, baptism by sprinkling or pouring water on the body is practised, and held to be valid*.

The Chrism, though a distinct mystery, is always administered immediately after baptism, and is the Confirmation of the Greek Church. This rite is performed by the priest, anointing the baptized person with holy ointment, with which he makes the sign of the cross on his forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, repeating these words at each sign—"The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost." This ointment is composed of upwards of twenty different ingredients, and is prepared

* I had an opportunity of seeing baptism administered to an adult, in the case of the Mongolian Chief Badma, who had been employed in the Translation of the New Testament for his own people, and who died in St. Petersburg on the 10th of November 1822. About nine in the morning of the 7th of November I called on Badma. The baptismal service was already begun. He was lying in bed, in a very weak state. Prince Galitzin was standing at the bed-side, as godfather; and the priest read the service, in the middle of the room, at a moveable altar, on which was a small font with water. Dr. Schmidt, and his Mongolian companion, with the physician, were the principal persons present. Instead of immersion, water was poured on his head, three times, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. He abandoned his own name, and his father's family name, on account of their both having an idolatrous meaning: his name was Badma Marshun, which he changed for John Alexandroff. During the ceremony, which lasted upwards of half an hour after I came in, and had continued as long before, he seemed to be much affected; but was able to repeat the responses. Immediately after baptism he received the other sacrament—bread and wine, soaked together in a cup, and given with a spoon. The pious Prince evidently felt much during the whole ceremony; and when the dying man partook of the Holy Communion, he shed many tears. He died on the third day after his baptism.

and consecrated with great ceremony, once a year, at Moscow, by a bishop, on Thursday in Passion Week.

After baptism, the priest hangs a small cross of about an inch long, of gold or silver or some other metal, upon the neck of the child, which is worn through life on the naked breast. The origin of this custom is traced by Tatischeff to the very first dawn of Christianity among the Russians, when, in the time of Vladimir I.. they were baptized in multitudes in the River Wolhoff, by Joachim, bishop of Novogorod, who ordered crosses to be suspended from the necks of those who had been baptized, in order to distinguish them from such as had not been baptized. But the common people are not satisfied alone with the cross, as a means of protection from the effects of the evil-eye, witchcraft, and other supposed supernatural influences: they also attach to the string which suspends the cross, amulets made of These amulets are applied to the child almost as soon as it is born, and are generally worn to the last moment of life. They are called, in Slavonic, Hzanilnaia. "preservative."

Another very singular custom, which forms a part of the baptismal ceremony, is cutting off, in the form of the cross, part of the hair of the infant; enveloping it in wax, and throwing it into the font, or sticking it up in a corner of the church. This is called Postrigania, "the shearing of the child," and is the same as the custom they had of cutting off the hair of the child when it received its name, in its seventh year.—A godfather and godmother, called kum and kuma, or Vospriemniki, "Receivers," are absolutely necessary to baptism. During the ten persecutions, in the first ages of the Christian Church, these Receivers, say the Russian bishops, were first employed at baptisms, in order that they might undertake to discharge the duty of Christian instruction on behalf of the child, in case the parents should be called upon to suffer martyrdom for their faith, and the child remain a helpless orphan: the frequency of such instances is said to have given rise to the usage.

In ancient times, the Russian princes usually bestowed upon their children two names, the one Slavonian and the other Greek; the first at the birth of the child, and the second at its baptism. This custom continued until the fourteenth century, when the Slavonian name was dropt, and the child began to be called after the Saint marked in the Kalendar on the eighth day after its birth.

Until the time of Peter I. it was the custom of the Russians, when addressing a petition to their superiors and their nobles, to sign their names in diminutives: thus, instead of Peter, Petrushka; Ivan, Ivashka; &c. These diminutives are much used even in the present day, by superiors when speaking to their inferiors, lords to their slaves, and parents to their children; but the above-mentioned emperor, by an ukaz of the 30th of December 1701, forbad the use of them in signatures.

The ancient Russians had, properly speaking, no family names; they used only the appellatives given to the child at its birth, joined to the designation which the father had received on his coming into the world. Afterwards they began to add various terms of distinction, taken from peculiar properties either of the mind or body; and these became the distinguishing marks of individuals of the same family, who retained at the same time the ancient form of the double appellation: thus, Feodor Ivanovitch, i.e. "Theodore the son of John;" Dolgoruki, "Longhanded." Dolgoruki thenceforth became the family designation for the whole race springing from the individual to whom it was first applied.

The family names of their ancient races of princes are taken either from the principalities which they governed; thus, the Prince Viazemski, from the town and country of Viazem;-from the rivers or places where they had distinguished themselves in defence of their country; thus. Donskie, from the Don: Nevskie, from the Neva:or from peculiar traits in their character; as, Grosnoi, "severe;" Gordie, "proud;" Heabrie, "brave;" Bogolubski, "God-loving;" Velikie, "great;"—or from some bodily imperfection; as, Kosie, "squinting;" Krasnie, "red;" Temnie, "dark," &c. &c. But the names of their reigning princes seem usually compounded with the word glory; thus, Sviatoslav, "Holy glory;" Vladislav, "Ruler of glory;" Stanislav, "Establisher of glory;"—and, among the females, Vozmislava, "Receiver of glory;" Podrajislava, "Imitatress of glory."

The nobles followed the same fashion; and hence the numerous branches of the same root; as, from Godun sprung the numerous families of Godunoffs: thus arose Soburoffs, Peshkoffs, Zernoffs, Beliaminoffs, Pelemoffs, &c. Prince Tscherbatoff, an eminent Russian historian, is of opinion, that the practice of naming all the branches of the same race by one family name was little known among the Russians till about the end of the fourteenth century. At last it became so general, that many adopted the surname of their father for their family name; as, Ivan Ivanovitch Ivanoff:—or they took their family name from their profession or situation in life; hence the Papoffs, Patersons; Diakonoffs, Deacons; Kuznitzoffs, Smiths; Hlebnikoffs, Bakers, &c.

According to the present ideas of civility in conversation, among all classes of the Russians, it is necessary to address each other by the individual's own and his father's name; but never by the name of their family.

adding Mr. to it, as is customary among us. This usage is difficult for a foreigner, even after he has attained to a considerable degree of readiness in the language; because it requires no ordinary exertion of memory to recollect, and properly apply, the name and the father's name to every one, especially in a large company. have sometimes been surprised at the ease with which the Russians acquire and retain these distinctions. address a man by his own and his father's name, is the most civil and respectful manner in which you can speak to him, or of him: and even in speaking of the Emperor himself, with the highest veneration, both nobles and peasants denominate him simply 'Alexander the son of Paul' (Alexander Paulovitch). His ministers, in speaking of him, generally use the title Gosudar, 'Sovereign'; or Gosudar Imperator, 'Sovereign Emperor': but in speaking to him, 'Your Imperial Majesty'. The same simplicity of address is customary towards the Empress and the Royal Dukes.

AFTER taking leave of the friends who had shewn me so much disinterested kindness during my stay, I left Odessa in a common Russian kibitka, with post-horses, accom-The Archimandrite panied by my servant Vasilie. Theophil, and three other members of the Bible Society. drove three versts with me; and, having seen me clear of the Custom-house, wished me a good journey, and returned. After travelling all night over the woodless steppes extending from Odessa northwards, we reached the banks of the Bugh, opposite Nicholaief, early the following morning. Here the river is nearly a mile broad; and the ice was so thin and thawing, that horses could not pass. I went into an ale-house kept by a Jew, and lay down upon a bench for an hour, until daybreak. The danger of attempting the passage of the ice during the thaw was considered so great, that I was not able for some time to prevail on any one to undertake the transporting of my kibitka across it. At last, fifteen sailors offered their services, on condition of being well paid. They tied twelve long ropes to the kibitka; and, with a man to each rope, they separated in the form of a fan, and dragged my carriage and baggage carefully, between the holes and pools upon the ice, across to the opposite bank. In a similar manner the other three conveyed me across, seated on a small sledge about two feet and a half long and two feet broad. ropes attached to my little sledge were about twenty yards long; and the men separated to a good distance from each other, so as to divide their weight equally upon a large surface. Though several accidents had taken place on the preceding days, we got over in safety, yet not without many fears. Soon after, we arrived in Nicholaief, where we breakfasted, and remained for some time.

Nicholaief, situated at the confluence of the Bugh and Ingul, was, next to Cronstadt, the greatest naval station of the Russians; but since the occupation of the admirable coves of Sevastopol, on the south shore of the Crimea, which resemble those of La Valetta in Malta, the Black-Sea fleet has been divided between these two The commanding admiral, however, still resides The wharfs, store-houses, admiraltyin Nicholaief. offices, markets, church, and some fine streets and private buildings, are all of brick, and built in modern style; in accordance with the hopes entertained, at its foundation in 1791, of its becoming a great city. But the vicinity of the newly-created port of Odessa, with far greater advantages for the commerce of the Black Sea, seems to have taken away all hope that Nicholaief will ever be more than a national depôt for vessels of war and naval stores. The situation is destitute of wood and good water; the rivers being generally brackish, from their vicinity to the Euxine. It is therefore necessary to bring water from a mile and a half distance; and wood of every kind must be brought down the rivers from the interior. The number of the inhabitants is about 8000; they are mostly connected with the Admiralty and the fleet.

Admiral Mordwinoff, a native Russian, who is well acquainted with England, and with the modern improvements in our British naval stations, contributed much, during the time he was commander-in-chief in the Black Sea, to perfect the Government works of Nicholaief, and to enlarge and beautify the town.

Leaving Nicholaief, we continued our course up the right bank of the Ingul for two stages, and reached Gromoklia about 9 o'clock in the evening. Every stage northward brought us nearer to the usual features of a Russian winter. Observing that my kibitka was giving way, and that it would cost too much to repair it, we sold it for one-third of what it cost in Odessa; and on 20th December, continued our course, on two common open sledges, towards Elizabetograd. It rained and snowed alternately the whole day; and the roads were in a terrible condition, from the dissolving of the snow; yet we travelled with great speed, the horses almost continually galloping. The rapidity with which the Russian couriers travel in winter is wonderful. The distance between Odessa and St. Petersburg is 1876 versts, or about 1400 English miles; which they travel in 120 hours, or five nights and five days.

During the last stage before reaching Elizabetograd, the frost set in; and being drenched from travelling the whole day exposed to the rain, we were in a pitiable condition on entering that town. It was a great favour that we obtained a warm room, in an inn kept by a German; where we lost no time in exchanging our frozen wet clothes for dry ones.

Elizabetograd has a considerable fortress attached to it: and. independent of the military, the inhabitants are about 3000, most of them Raskolniks, or Dissenters from the National Church. The severe persecutions to which the different sects of Raskolniks have been subjected, have caused them, like the Protestants of France, to take refuge in the most southern provinces and borders of the empire, and especially among the Poles, Little Russians, and Don Kozacks; where they enjoy greater freedom than in the interior; and whence, in the time of persecution, they can more easily escape to a foreign land. Yet, notwithstanding all the severities of the civil and ecclesiastical powers—which however, so far as I have been able to learn, never amounted to capital punishment, (though exile, stripes, confiscation of property, imprisonment, &c. &c. have all been employed,) they still abound in almost every province. Their morality is generally of a higher standard than that of the common Russians; and many of the most wealthy and eminent merchants of Moscow and St. Petersburg belong to the Dissenters. But, having spoken of these different sects in a former publication, I shall not here repeat what was there stated: only in regard to one sect. who in many points resemble the Society of Friends, and are known under the different names of Duchobortzi. Molochani. and Duchovnie Christiani.* I shall add such additional information as I have since obtained.

^{*} Duchobortzi, "Wrestlers with the Spirit."—Molochani, "Eaters of milk in the time of the Fasts."—Duchovnie Christiani, "Spiritual Christians."

In 1816, after having visited the tribe of Nogay Tartars that wander with their flocks and herds about the extensive steppes of Little Tartary, on the Sea of Asoff, and having made preparations for supplying the villages of German colonists, recently settled there, with the Holy Scriptures, I purposed, on my way towards the Crimea, to see the Duchobortzi who live on the River Molochnia and on the Sea of Asoff.

On approaching the first of their villages, on the Molochnia, I met with a female, and inquired of her where the chief person of the place resided. The answer she gave me was, "Among us, no one is greater than another." The next person I met was a shepherd attending his flock, an old man with grey hair. I made my driver stop, and beckoned to the man to draw near. This he did; and uncovering his head, he leaned over his staff and replied to my inquiries. I asked him if he could read: he replied, "Yes; I can read the word of life." From this I naturally thought that he was able to read the Bible, and offered him a Tract on the Bible Society. He refused, however, to accept it; saying, that he could not read our books, but only the book of life which he had learnt by heart; in other words, that he could repeat the principal doctrinal and moral Articles of the sect. And when I touched upon some of the Articles, as given in my work on the Greek Church, he repeated them distinctly: in others of them his memory failed him.

I stopped in a second village, and without ceremony entered one of the best-looking houses, requesting a glass of water: this a young man readily handed to me. After a little talk with him, I discovered that I was in the Chancery, or place where the civil affairs of the sect are transacted. I told him distinctly what my object was in visiting them, and begged him to introduce me to some of their seniors. All this seemed rather suspicious to him; yet he sent for one of the Elders, who had been in Petersburg as a deputy to the Government, and who soon after, with several of his brethren, made his appearance. After a little talk about Senator Hoblitz, and other gentlemen who had shewn them kindness during their stay in Petersburg, they seemed in some degree to lay aside their reserve, and replied more freely to my inquiries. I took out my volume on the Greek Church, and read to the assembly the passages which I had written concerning the Duchobortzi; and I had the satisfaction of hearing them distinctly state their principles in the very terms there given. As soon as I began any paragraph by translating a few words, they generally gave the remainder exactly as stated in the book. two Prayers they repeated verbatim. One passage only was found to require explanation—that of their having all things in common (page 312). This was their practice when they came to the Molochnia; but now every family has its own private property, cattle, fields, &c. &c. Still they have fields of corn, gardens, and flocks which belong to the whole community, and the revenues of which are applied for the common benefit of the society. This is also the custom of the Mennonites, who live near them, and of other German colonists; a custom, in their case, independent of religious considerations.

This extraordinary sect (the Duchobortzi) is settled in eight villages, and consists of about 2500 souls. I saw an individual of them who had been sixteen years exiled to Siberia, for conscience sake. He spoke with great feeling, when contrasting his former sufferings with his present prosperous circumstances. He was a fine-looking, middle-aged man, and was returning on horseback from viewing his corn-fields and flocks, country like, without his coat. They have been collected from every part of the empire, and are entirely separated from the Greek Church: indeed it was the object of Government, in colonizing them here, to put it out of their power to make any more proselytes to their peculiar opinions. Their neat and clean dress, comfortable-looking huts, and industrious habits, their numerous flocks, and extensive and well-cultivated fields, widely distinguish them from the common Russian peasantry.

Their neighbours the Mennonites, and other German colonists, speak well of their morals: but all complain of the reserve and shyness of their character. No doubt they have been taught this by the severe persecutions to which they have for ages been exposed, and out of which they can scarcely yet believe themselves delivered. Their neighbours seem to know but little of their religious tenets. The Mennonites say they are a peaceable and industrious people, but accuse them of hypocrisy: hence, say they, when some of their members were convicted of drunkenness, they denied the fact, and maintained that their members were all holy. Very few among them appear to be capable of reading; vet their members seem to have had the doctrines of the sect instilled into them by oral instruction. These lessons are committed to memory. They have no schools for their children; nor did I see a book of any kind among them. I recommended to them the Bible, and offered to supply them with it; but they refused to accept any copies, saying, "That what was in the Bible was in them also!" I told them that some of their neighbours suspected them of immoral habits, because in speaking of females and children they did not use the common expressions of "My wife," "My child," &c., but "My sister," "Our child," &c. This insinuation they indignantly repelled, exclaiming—"Are we then beasts?" "But," continued they, "we are accustomed to every kind of false accusation."

Their whole aspect, and manner of intercourse with strangers, indicate a degree of shyness and distrust which is quite extraordinary; hence, also, their evasive answers to all direct inquiries respecting their sect. Some of them, however, ventured to speak with me freely, and with warmth, against the use of images in worship. Their assemblies for religious purposes are held in the open air, or in private dwellings, according as the weather suits. They say their doctrines are as old as the world; and they either would not, or could not, give me any particulars of the rise of the sect in It was, doubtless, the heavy burden of superstitious ceremonies in the services of the Greek Church which drove the founders of this sect to reject all ceremony, and external ordinances of every kind. Many, of this sect. I fear, are Deists.

But we need not wonder at these indications of fear and distrust; for at the very time I visited them, as I afterwards learned, intrigues were on foot in order to ruin them, under the twofold accusation of their harbouring deserters, and making proselytes. This attempt gave rise to the following Rescript from the late Emperor Alexander, to the Governor-general of Cherson; which, on account of the principles it contains, I willingly insert, in an English translation.

"TO THE MILITARY GOVERNOR OF CHERSON.

"From two Reports which you have sent to the Minister of Police, respecting the settlers in the district of Melitopol usually denominated Duchobortzi, I observe that you desire to have them removed from their present situation, and settled in another. You are led to make this proposition by certain rumours which have reached you respecting their alleged wicked lives and anti-social principles, and their efforts to propagate the same.

"In consequence of this, and also of petitions sent in from the Duchobortzi themselves, praying for protection from oppression, I have already ordered the Minister of Police to correspond with you, about procuring the most specific information respecting the Duchobortzi.

"At the same time, I judge it necessary to call your attention, in a particular manner, to the original occasion of removing these people from the Ukraine and other governments, and settling them in the Melitopol district of the Taurian government, on the stream Mo-This removal and colonizing took place, as you may learn, expressly by my orders, given to the then Governor of New Russia, Miklashefskov, on the 26th of January 1802; partly on account of the miseries which they had suffered, and partly with the view of protecting them from the improper and fruitless severities used against them on account of their peculiar religious opinions. They are now sufficiently separated from intercourse with the rest of the nation, and thereby a stop is put to the further extension of this sect.

For several years past the Government has received no complaints, from any quarter, respecting disorders among them; and, on this account, it has sufficient reason to believe the measures already adopted adequate.

"The secession of this people from the orthodox Græco-Russian Church is certainly, on their side, an error, grounded on certain false opinions respecting real worship and the spirit of Christianity. This proceeds from a want of cultivation; for they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.

"But, is it proper for an enlightened Christian Government to attempt to bring back the strayed sheep into the bosom of the Church by severe and oppressive means? The doctrine of the Saviour of the world, who appeared on earth to seek and to save that which was lost, can never be instilled into men by force and oppression—can never justify the infliction of temporal ruin on him whom it seeks to bring into the way of truth. True faith is produced by the grace of God, through conviction; and cometh through instruction, meekness, and, above all, good example. Severity, on the contrary, convinceth not; but hardeneth more and more. All the measures of severity exhausted upon the Duchobortzi, during the thirty years preceding 1801, not only did not root out this sect, but more and more increased the number of its adherents.

"The rulers of several provinces have repeatedly given very favourable reports of the behaviour of the Duchobortzi; though, at the same time, they complained of them for separating from the orthodox Church. The senators Lapuhin and Neledinskoy Meletski, at their revision of the government of Ukraine in 1801, having found them there, gave them, in many respects, though they did not defend their errors, a good character;

because they judged of them impartially, and according to Christian charity.

"All these circumstances clearly prove, that it is not a removal of these people to new settlements which demands my consideration, but the granting to them speedy protection from all superfluous severities on account of their peculiar opinions in the affairs of salvation and conscience; matters, in which force and oppression ought never to have any part.

"The removal and re-settling of them, for such a cause, would bring upon them new troubles; and they would thus be punished on account of a mere report, without having the truth of the accusation inquired into and proved. Government never acts thus, on any occasion, or with any person whatever; nor can the orthodox Church, however desirous of bringing back those children who have abandoned her communion, approve of persecution in this matter; which is so contrary to the spirit of her Head, Christ the Saviour, that He has left to His followers this memorable saying: 'But if ye had known what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless:' Matt. xii. 7.

"It is only by acting according to this spirit, the spirit of true Christianity, that the desired object is ever likely to be attained.

"This colony I therefore commit to your own particular and immediate inspection and care. Not trusting to the reports of any one, you will not fail impartially to examine into all the circumstances of the case yourself: learn, in particular, their manner of life and conversation, viewing them with the eye of an impartial and watchful ruler, who seeks the prosperity of Government in promoting the good of the different classes of its subjects committed to his care. It is necessary that all should feel, that they live under the security and protection of the laws: then it may be expected that they will love and feel attachment to the Government, and look for justice consistent with the laws, which are so beneficent to them. Should you even discover that there are amongst the colonists those who conceal deserters—or that they try to seduce others from the National Church, into their own way of thinking about Religion—then turn the force of the law against such acts only as are contrary to it, and thereby put a stop to the evil. But, even then, it must not be allowed, that for the sake of one, or even several offenders convicted of these crimes, the whole society of the settlers, who have had no part in them, should be involved, or suffer persecution.

" On occasions of this kind, when reports and accusations are sent in, an attentive inquiry is necessary, to ascertain by whom such accusations are made, and what may be their probable motive for making them. the two Duchobortzi mentioned in your Reports, who. after their return to the orthodox Church, accused this society of various crimes, and gave information respecting the wicked lives which its members led, may have done all this out of anger or revenge; for it may very easily have happened, that they themselves were excluded from the society because of their bad conduct, or left it on account of some quarrel or enmity. The mere accusations of such persons hardly deserve any attention at all, and ought never to serve as the foundation of an immediate and severe censure, apprehension, imprisonment, and persecution, of people not yet convicted of any evil intentions or actions.

"Even the very examination into a suspected offence ought to be conducted in such a way, that the innocent may on no occasion suffer in consequence of it.

"You will therefore not fail to conform punctually to these my sentiments here expressed; and from following this course I anticipate every possible success.

"In the mean time, you will report to me fully concerning the measures you adopt, and the discoveries you make, after taking this colony under your own immediate protection.

"ALEXANDER."

" St. Petersburg, Dec. 9, 1816."

I shall here insert a document, which will furnish a clearer view of their principles, and also a specimen of the manner in which they used to be treated by their spiritual judges. It was transmitted to the Governorgeneral of Harkoff, by Gabriel, metropolitan of Novogorod and St. Petersburg; accompanied by the following Letter, dated May 12, 1792:—

"SIR-

"Michael Stschireff, Anikie and Timothy Suhareiff, sent by your Excellency from the vicinity of Harkoff, have been admonished by Innokentie, rector of the Nevskoy Seminary, and Archimandrite. The conversation which took place between them I forward to you, along with this Letter.

"I knew this sect as early as 1768. I then admonished them, and succeeded in turning several to the Church; but on their returning home, they again fell into their former errors. Since I became Archbishop of St. Petersburg, I have also spoken to some of the Don Kozacks; but they remained obstinate. Their obstinacy is founded on enthusiasm: all the demonstration which is presented to them they despise, saying that 'God is present in their souls, and He instructs them:—how then shall they hearken to a man?' They have such exalted ideas of their own holiness, that they respect that man only in whom they see the image of God; that is, per-They say that every one of them may be fect holiness. a prophet or an apostle: and therefore they are zealous propagators of their own sect. They make the Sacraments consist only in a spiritual reception of them, and therefore reject Infant Baptism. The opinions held by them not only establish equality, but also exclude the distinction of ruler and subject: such opinions are therefore the more dangerous, because they may become attractive to the peasantry. The truth of this Germany has experienced. Their origin is to be sought for among the Anabaptists or Quakers. I know the course of their opinions; and we can have no hope that they will desist from spreading abroad this evil.

"These are my thoughts, which I have considered it my duty to communicate to your Excellency.

"With sincere respect,

" I am, &c.

A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE RECTOR OF THE NEVSKOY SEMINARY OF ST. PETERSBURG, ARCHIMANDRITE INNOKENTIE, AND THREE OF THE SECT CALLED DUCHOBORTZI, MICHAEL STSCHIREFF, ANIKIE AND TIMOTHY SUHAREIFF, IN MAY 1792.

Archimandrite. By what means are you come into this state, that people confine you as men dangerous to society?

Duchobortsi. By the malice of our persecutors.

- A. What is the cause of their persecuting you?
- D. Because it is said that all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.
 - A. Whom do you call your persecutors?
- D. Those who threw me into prison, and bound me in fetters.
- A. How dare you, in this way, speak evil of the established Government, founded and acting on principles of Christian piety? which deprives none of their liberty, except such as are disturbers of the public peace and prosperity.
- D. There is no higher Governor than God, who rules over the hearts of kings and men: but God does not bind in fetters; neither does he command those to be persecuted who will not give His glory to another, and who live in peace, and in perfect love and mutual service to each other.
- A. What does that signify, "Who will not give his glory unto another"?—to whom other?
- D. Read the Second Commandment, and you will know.
- A. I perceive, then, that you mean to throw censure on those who bow before the images of the Saviour and of His holy ones?

- D. He has placed his image in our souls. Again, it is said that those who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.
- A. From this it is evident, that you have brought yourself into your present condition, by falling into error; by misunderstanding the nature of piety, and entertaining opinions hurtful to the common faith and to your country.
 - D. It is not true.
- A. How, then? Do you not err, when you think that there are 'powers that be' which exist in opposition to the will of God; whereas there is no power but of God? or that Government, which is appointed to restrain and correct the disobedient and unruly, persecutes piety; "whereas he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil"?
 - D. What evil do we do? None.
- A. Do you not hurt the faith by your false reasoning concerning her holy ordinances, and by your blind zeal against God; like the Jews of old, whose zeal was not according to knowledge?
- D. Let knowledge remain with you! Only do not molest us, who live in peace, pay the taxes, do harm to no one, and respect and obey earthly governments.
- A. But perhaps your paying the taxes, harming no one, and obeying earthly governments, is only the effect of necessity, and of the weakness of your power; while your peace and love respect those only who are of your own opinion.
 - D. Construe our words as you choose.
- A. At least, it is far from being disagreeable to you, I suppose, to behold your society increasing!
- D. We desire good unto all men, and that all may be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth.
 - A. Leave off your studied secresy, and evasive and dubious answers. Explain and reveal to me your opinions candidly, like men who have nothing in view but to discover truth.

- D. I understand you; for that same Spirit of Truth, which enlightens us in things respecting faith and life, assists us also to discern affectation and deceit in every man. Nevertheless, in order to get rid of your importunity, and with boldness to preach the true faith, I shall answer your questions as I am able.
- A. By what way—by the assistance of others, or by the use of your own reasoning powers only, did you obtain this Spirit of Truth?
- D. He is near our heart, and therefore no assistance is necessary. A sincere desire and ardent prayers are alone requisite.
- A. At least, you ground your opinions on the word of God, do you not?
 - D. I do ground myself on it.
- A. But the word of God teaches us, that God has committed the true faith, and the dispensing of his ordinances, and of instruction in piety, to certain persons, chosen and ordained for this purpose:—"According to the grace of God given unto me," says St. Paul, "as a wise master-builder I have laid the foundation."
- D. True: and such were our deputies who were sent hither in 1767 and 1769. But what did the spirit of persecution and of wrath do to them? Some were taken for soldiers; others were sent into exile.
- A. You doubtless intend, by these deputies, some well-meaning people like yourself?

But you, and people like you, though wellig, cannot be either ministers or teachers of the ith.

D. Why not?

- A. Because a Church cannot be established by individual authority; as is manifest from 1 Cor. iii. 5. Secondly, because special talents and gifts from above are requisite, to "make us able ministers of the New Testament:" 2 Cor. iii. 6. And, thirdly, it is absolutely necessary to this lawful and gracious calling, that we possess that ordination which hath remained in the holy Church from the times of the Apostles; as it is said: "And he gave some Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ:" Ephes. iv. 2.
- D. There is no other calling to this office required, than that which crieth in our hearts: neither doth our learning consist in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in "demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Are the gifts which you require such as to be able to gabble Latin?
- A You do not understand the Holy Scriptures; and this is the source of all your errors. The Apostle, in the words quoted by you, does not reject the talents and gifts of acquired knowledge, but contrasts the doctrines of Jesus Christ with the wisdom of the heathen, which was in repute at that time. And that the calling of pastors and teachers always depended on the Church by which they were chosen, is manifest from the very history of those pastors and teachers of the Church who are eternally glorified.
- D. What Holy Scriptures? What Church? What do you mean by Holy Scriptures?
- A. Did not you yourself say that you founded your opinions on the word of God? That is what I mean by the Holy Scriptures.

- D. The word of God is spiritual, and immaterial; it can be written on nothing but on the heart and spirit.
- A. Yet when the Saviour saith, "Search the Scriptures," and gives us the reason of this command—"for in them ye think ye have eternal life,"—can He really understand thereby any thing else than the written word of God? This is the treasure which He himself hath entrusted to his holy Church, as the unalterable rule of faith and life.
 - D. And what do you call a church?
- A. An assembly of believers in Jesus Christ, governed by pastors according to regulations founded on the word of God, and partakers of the ordinances of faith.
- D. Not so: there is but one Pastor, Jesus Christ, who laid down his life for the sheep: and one Church, holy, apostolical, spiritual, invisible, of which it is said, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them;" in which no worship is paid to any material object; where those only are teachers who live virtuous lives; where the word of God is obeyed in the heart, on which it descends like dew upon the fleece, and out of which it flows as from a spring in the midst of the mountains; where there are no such noisy, ostentatious, offensive, and idolatrous meetings and vain ceremonies as with you; no drunken and insulting pastors and teachers like yours; nor such evil dispositions and corruptions as among you.
- A. You have here mixed up many things together: let us consider them one by one. 1st, That the Saviour Christ is the only chief Pastor and Head of the Church, is a truth: for He hath founded it by His own merits; under His Almighty providence it exists, is guarded and protected; and "the gates of hell shall never prevail against it." Spiritually, Christ is united to it; for.

"behold! I am with you, even to the end of the world:" and by the power of His grace He helpeth the prayers and petitions of believers. But it does not seem good to the wisdom and majesty of God, that all, without distinction, should be engaged in the external state and service of the Church, which is so closely united to the internal; and therefore, from the very first ages, this has been committed unto worthy pastors and teachers, "as stewards of the mysteries of God." 2dly. I said that the external state of the Church is very closely united to the internal. Certainly it is so. Who does not know how powerfully the passions and the flesh work in us, both to good and evil, according to the nature of the object presented to them? We have need to recruit the efforts of our minds by such salutary aids; and to stir up the expiring flame of piety within us, by memorials of the goodness of God, and of the example of holy men. Here is the whole of what you so improperly style material and idolatrous worship. So long as we are united to matter, that is, to the body, we can never reach that pure and inward spiritual worship of God which the holy angels present unto Him, or such as that of the eternally-glorified saints; and on this account, when God requires that we should worship Him in spirit and in truth, it is to warn us against shameful hypocrisy, or other dispositions of mind not corresponding with our external worship. 3dly, With respect to the scandalous lives of some pastors, they can never harm the essence of faith; for that is not the cause of their bad conduct. And that their irregularities can never excuse those who on this account leave the Church and despise her doctrine, is witnessed by the Saviour Himself, in his discourse with the Pharisees: "The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat," saith he: "all therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not." Moreover, Christian humility should have deterred you from judging so rashly concerning general corruption and evil dispositions. But I have purposely not yet answered several of your expressions, such as "idolatrous meetings and vain ceremonies," that I might first ask you what you mean by them?

- D. You may conjecture that yourself.
- A. Well: do not even you shew becoming respect for the characters of those, who have been distinguished for holiness, and after death glorified by God, as patterns of faith and virtue?
 - D. Where and whom hath God thus glorified?
- A. Are the names of Chrysostom, Gregory the Great, and such like, unknown to you?
 - D. I know them.
 - A. What do you think of them?
 - D. What do I think?—Why, they were men!
- A. But holy men, whose faith and lives were agreeable to God; and on this account they are miraculously glorified from above.
 - D. Well, let us suppose so.
- A. Now it is to them that the Church is indebted for all those offices and ceremonies, which you denominate idolatrous and vain; and the worship of images has been declared not to be sinful by the Council of the Holy Fathers;—how then will you make this agree with your views?
- D. I know not. I only know, that hell will be filled with priests and deacons, and unjust judges. As for me, I will worship God as he instructs me.
- A. But can you, without danger, depend upon yourself? Are you not afraid, that sometimes you may mistake your own opinions, and even foolish imaginations, for Divine inspiration?

- D. How?—To prevent this, reason is given unto us. I know what is good, and what is bad.
- A. A poor dependence! With the best reason, sometimes, good appears to be evil, and evil to be good.
- D. I will pray to God: He will send His word:—and God never deceives.
- A. True, God never deceives: but you deceive yourself, assuring yourself of that, on His part, which never took place.
 - D. God does not reject the prayers of believers.
- A. Believers—true: those requests which are agreeable to the law of faith, Divine Wisdom will not reject: but "ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss." For this purpose hath He given us the Book of his divine word, that in it we may behold His will, and that our petitions may be directed according to it. But it is vain to expect in the present day miraculous and immediate inspirations, without sufficient cause, particularly such as are unworthy of Him: and to pretend to such inspirations and revelations, is very hurtful to society, and therefore ought to be checked.
- D. But to me they appear to be very useful, salutary, and worthy of acceptation.
- A. What? to break off from the society of your countrymen, though united with you by the same laws and the same articles of faith, and to introduce strange doctrines, and laws of your own making?—to begin to expound the doctrines of the Gospel without the aid of an enlightened education, disregarding the advice of such men as are most versed and experienced in those things; and out of your own head to found upon all this a separate society? Is it not also to rise against your country, when you refuse to serve it where the sanctity of an oath is required? Should not the simple command of the higher powers be sufficient to unite you with others to defend your country, your fellow-citizens, and your faith?

D.

- A. Why do you make no answer to this?
- D. There is nothing to say. I am not so loquacious as you; neither have I need of it.
- A. But do you not see, at least, whither your blind zeal is leading you, and that you deserve to suffer much more than all that has yet befallen you?—We look for your repentance and amendment.
- D. Do what you choose with us: we are happy to suffer for the faith: this is no new thing. Did you ever hear the old story?
 - A. Tell me, I pray you, what story?
- D. " A certain man planted a vineyard, and set a hedge about it, and digged a place for the winefat, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country. And at the season he sent to the husbandmen a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard. And they caught him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. . . . And again he sent another; and him they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some. Having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard. What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do? he will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others:" Mark xii.

- 1-9. Now I have done with you.
- A. At least, answer me this: How can it be reconciled, that you reject the Holy Scriptures, and at the same time endeavour to support yourself upon them?
- D. Argue as you will. I have spoken what was necessary, and shall not say another word.

Other documents of the same kind might be given. I shall only add, that the sect of the Duchobortzi, Molochani, or Spiritual Christians, is numerous in Russia; and that though in many things they agree, in essential points also they are found to differ.

In March 1822, I met with a most interesting Spiritual Christian, the minister of one of their assemblies, in St. Petersburg, and had a long conversation with him in the house of a Russian noble. His name was Isaiah. He was a man about sixty years of age-in appearance, a simple bearded peasant, dressed in coarse wide russet garments. I conversed with him for nearly three hours on the essential doctrines of the Gospel, and found him, in general, very sound. His knowledge was taken solely from the word of God, of which he was one of the most powerful quoters I ever conversed with. His views of the faith and practice of a Christian, drawn from this source, were beautifully simple and harmonious. like the Duchobortzi, he rejected the external ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. He seemed to insist much upon the evidences of a living faith; and that nothing could entitle a person to the name of a Christian but Christianity in practice. As he had no acquaintance with scholastic theology, nor any systematic form of faith, I was astonished at his skill in illustrating one part of Scripture by another, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, and the wonderful facility with which he applied the whole force of truth to the regulation of the heart and life. In this poor peasant I saw an illustrious example of the power of the divine word, under the blessing of God, to make even the simple, and those who in respect of human learning are babes, truly wise. congregation, he told me, consisted of about 500 souls. who formed a village near Mosdok. They had five elders to labour among them in spiritual things, who are chosen from among themselves, and ordained to their office by the laying on of the hands of the whole Church, and He spoke of their brethren as being very prayer. numerous, and scattered over all the provinces of the empire; they were also known under the name of Molochani; but were not all equally pure in doctrine and practice. He said that he had been sent forth by his Church for the express purpose of visiting the brethren. and ministering to their spiritual wants by doctrine and conversation: many of them, he added, were becoming purer in faith and practice.

He stated that the great body of Molochani entertain superstitious ideas respecting "the kiss of charity," or form of salutation used among them;—that, on saluting each other, they pay a kind of mutual devotional respect, by bowing themselves to the ground, as before "the image of God," and the "temple in which the Holy Ghost dwells;"—that they therefore look upon the kiss of charity as one of the most sacred acts. In some provinces, he said, he had found them denying the Last Judgment, saying that it was already come, and the Second Advent of Christ already past: it was one object of his travels to purify them of these errors; but he regretted that some of their congregations had unworthy teachers.

In his views of the invocation of saints, the use of images, prayers for the dead, &c., he held pure Protestant principles. He said that in public worship they use no books but the Bible. They practise no vows of celibacy;—he himself had a wife and children at home. Their ritual, he said, consists chiefly of extemporary prayer, and exposition of the Scriptures in a familiar and easy manner by their ministers. He said that many of the Duchobortzi are now become Nationalists, and reject the written word of God, saying that they have the word of God in themselves. This seems to be a natural consequence of the singular error of the Molochani above mentioned—that of paying a kind of worship to each other.

It is very difficult to form an estimate of the actual extent of Scripture knowledge, or maintenance of the vital doctrines of Christianity, among the Russian people generally. Their acquaintance with these things is very contracted through ignorance, and sadly mixed with superstition. Yet I think there are few of them, that are of age, who have not learnt to repeat the Lord's Prayer, and many also the Creed; and who, on being questioned, would not reply—that they are sinners—that sin is a transgression of the Law of God-that Christ Jesus, the Son of God, came into the world to save sinners—that He died on the cross to redeem us—that we must pray for the pardon of our sins, for His sake—that at death the soul goes to heaven or hell-and that Christ will come again to judge the world at the Resurrection. This knowledge is principally obtained by attendance on the public ordinances of Religion, where most of these doctrines are made prominent in the daily service; which, though in the ancient language, is, for the greater part, still intelligible to the people. A portion of the Gospels is also read every day in the service; and not unfrequently a sermon on holidays, from a course of Homilies for every Sunday in the year, published by the Synod; or the priest preaches one of his own. But, in general, the real religious knowledge of the multitude does not go far beyond these general principles—oftentimes, alas! but vaguely conceived, and vaguely expressed when they are questioned concerning them.

A second class, including merchants, mechanics, and even peasantry, who are able to read, and have applied themselves to the subject of Religion, can go into more extensive Scripture details, and in their opinions are principally guided by the works of the Ancient Greek Fathers (most of which are translated into the Slavonic language) and the writings of their own clergy.

One of the most remarkable distinctions betwixt the Eastern and the Western Churches is the tolerant spirit of the former. And to no other adequate cause can be attributed the existence, under a despotic Government. of such numbers of different sects as we find in Russia, who, for various causes, have left the communion of the National Church. These are divided into two classes: the Popoftschini, or such as have priests; and the Bezpopoftschini, such as have no priests. To the former division belong the Starobredsi. or Old Ceremonialists; the Diaconoftschini, Perimazanoftschini, or Re-anointers; the Epefanoftschini; the Tschernaboltsi, &c. &c. To the second division belong the Duchobortzi, Molochani, Pomoryani, Theodosiani, Philipoftschini, Netovtschini, Pastushkoltoglasia, Novojentzi, Samskrestschentsi or Self-baptizers, Tschuvstviniki, Ikonobortsi or rejecters of images and pictures in worship, Seleznevtschini, &c. &c. In addition to these, there are probably thirty smaller sects in Russia, whose peculiar sentiments and usages have never been thoroughly inquired into: but of the principal opinions of the above-named sects an account will be found in my volume on the Greek Church in Russia. The difference between the National Church and the most of these sects does not properly relate to the grand articles of faith: for they, like the Mother Church, hold the Nicene Creed to be the symbol of their belief; but they refuse to join the established Church, because they say, that, in the time of the Patriarch Nikon (1654), the Church books and ceremonies were in many places altered, and heretical practices and opinions introduced. The contest, accordingly, between the greater part of the Raskolniks and the Church is not whether pictures should be used in divine worship, but whether old or new ones should be used ;--not whether upwards of twenty volumes folio, containing their Church service, teach doctrines agreeable to the word of God, but whether they should hold the old manuscript copies of them to be genuine, or receive those which have been corrected according to the Greek original, and printed by order of Tzar Alexie Michaelovitch, in pursuance of the decision of the Council of Moscow, held in 1654, at which the Tzar presided, and which was attended by Nikon, five metropolitans, five archbishops, eleven archimandrites, and thirteen priests. was to no purpose that these Russian Fathers attempted to convince the Old Ceremonialists that the Slavonic copies which they possessed were not originals, and consequently could not be standards by which to try other translations. All arguments were answered by one position—'According to these books, our fathers believed, and are saved; and through the same belief we hope to be where they now are.'

Thus the great schism which took place in the Russian Church, in the end of the seventeenth century, was founded on ignorance and misunderstanding, and arose, in a great measure, from the incautious way in which the ecclesiastical reform at that time was made. the Raskolniks of the present day have laid aside many of the absurd and ignorant opinions which distinguished their ancestors: and indeed the greater part of the Old Ceremonialists are better versed in the Holy Scriptures than their neighbours belonging to the National Church. I have met with many of them who could, with great readiness, quote Scripture, in support of their opinions; and though their forefathers were such enemies to printed copies of the Scriptures, yet I have more than once found a printed folio Bible in the hut of a Raskolnik; and the translation of the New Testament into the Modern Russ has also been well received by them.

The Raskolniks are distinguished for their exemplary morals. An Old Ceremonialist has rarely been known to have a suit at law against a brother. They strive to settle all their disputes by arbitration among themselves. A great proportion of the most opulent Russian merchants in Moscow, Petersburg, Vladimir, and other towns of the empire, are Raskolniks; and not only foreigners, but even the Russians themselves, depend more upon their integrity in dealings than upon others. But the persecutions to which they have at different times been subjected have made them shy and cautious in declaring their opinions; and as they are not allowed to publish any thing in their own defence, it is very difficult to obtain correct information, respecting either the peculiar sentiments, or probable numbers, of the different sects which have separated from the Russian Church; for all that has been published on these subjects comes from their opponents. Many of them also conceal their opinions, and the party to which they belong, on account of the general odium which is still attached to the name of Raskolnik. Some of the sects included in this general name have renounced both the old and the new books and pictures, and have formed a creed for themselves from the word of God. After the various unsuccessful attempts which had been made by Government to bring the Raskolniks again into the bosom of the Church, Catherine II., in 1785, published an ukaz, granting them permission to use the old manuscript books, and inviting them to receive regularlyordained priests from the Mother Church. This proposition has been embraced by many of them; and all open persecution of them, since that time, has been interdicted by the Government: so that the Old Ceremonialists have now their own churches and priests; but most of the other sects meet in private, not being countenanced by the Government.

The above causes make it almost impossible to ascertain the number of Dissenters of different names in Russia, scattered as they are over every province, and particularly numerous in the principal commercial towns and in the southern parts of the empire; but, on a moderate calculation, they amount to more than two millions.

On the 23d of December we left Elizabetograd, in a covered travelling-sledge, which in form much resembles a cradle; the upper part covered with felt and mats, the inside lined with the same: our baggage was packed in it, with plenty of hay, and a mattress and pillows over all. It cost about eighty roubles (3l. 4s.) The frost and drifting of the snow rendered travelling difficult. We entered Novomirgorod about one o'clock. This place also has a fortress of some importance; and contains two churches, and about 3000 inhabitants, consisting of Russians and Servians. They cultivate the soil with considerable success on the banks of the streams Visa and Sinianka. We did not stop at Novomirgorod; but travelled all night, and reached the small district town of Boguslaff, in the government of Kief, on the morning of the 24th.—Terrible weather to-day, from frost and drifting snows; great difficulty in keeping on the road; frequently plunging into pools of melted snow, not yet bound up by the frost. We arrived at Vasilikoff in the evening, and obtained a cup of tea and some cold fowl, in an inn or schenk kept by a Jew: this was very acceptable, for we had had nothing the whole day, excepting tea in the morning. We had again to contend with bad roads and the inclemency of the elements, and arrived in the ancient city of Kief a little past midnight; where, after many objections, a Jew took us in, on condition of my engaging to pay him five roubles a day for two miserable cold rooms, in a small wooden house. There was no possibility of sleeping, on account of the cold. My poor servant was still more to be pitied than myself, having been more exposed to sleet and frost, Antiquity and sanctity of Kief-Introduction of Christianity among the Russians in the tenth century—Translation of the Scriptures into the Slavonic—Present extent of the Slavonic Tribes—Account of the ancient system of Idolatry prevalent among the Russians as Heathen—Remaining traces of this Idolatry, in their usages—Funeral Ceremonies—Church Music—Visit to the Archimandrite Antonie, of the Pestchersky Monastery—its Printing-office—Visit to the Prison, and City Hospital—Description of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia—Interview with the Metropolitan, Serapion—Visit to the Military Hospital—Account of the sacred Catacombs—Shrine of Nestor, the Russian Chronologist—Arsenie the Monk—Legends of the Russians—Visit to Vasan, a blind Monk—Depôt of the Kief Bible Society—Distribution of the Scriptures—Public Dinner to the Clergy, at the Metropolitan's.

KIEF, the most ancient capital of Russia, has much in its history, and even in its preserved antiquities, to interest the traveller. It is still looked upon as a kind of Mount Zion by the Russians, whither many thousands of them, from all parts of the empire, annually go up, to worship at the shrines of their renowned saints of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. It was here that Christianity first dawned upon the nation; and though her light was already clouded by the traditions and commandments of men, yet how precious and salutary has it proved, since the tenth century, to the Slavonic tribes! What a contrast between the religion of Christ and the cruel system of idolatry which overspread all these regions, until the days of Vladimir, who erected the first church here, in 989. Before that period, there seems to have been no trace of civilization or letters among the Russians. The alphabet of St. Cyril appears to have been the first which was ever adopted for writing their uncultivated language: it was first employed by that renowned Greek Missionary, and his companion Methodius, for a truly noble purpose—the translation of the Bible, from the Greek, into the Slavonian tongue. This version has remained in use among them for 800 years; and though in the present age but imperfectly understood, it is still daily read in their churches and families.*

* Had it not been for the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches, which introduced a difference of Church ritual, and the use of three different alphabets in writing their common language, the Slavonic tribes would have been able still to read each other's writings in the Cyrillian alphabet.

The first edition of the Slavonic Bible was printed in Prague, in 1519; and the second in Ostrog, in 1581. A copy of this latter edition I met with in the library of the Lyceum at Warsaw, in 1816. I was curious to see whether it contained 1 John V. 7; and, on examination, found that it did not. This verse is found in the version now used in Russia, which follows the edition of Ostrog; but it has undergone four different revisions, in the time of Nikon, and during the reign of the Empress Elizabeth. It was first printed at Moscow, in 1663. The Russian Bible Society stereotyped this version in 4to. and 8vo., and printed not fewer than 133,788 copies of it, with 91,783 copies of the New Testament. The Ostrog edition is said to have been corrected from an ancient manuscript written in the time of the Grand Prince Vladimir, who may be denominated the Constantine of the Russian Church. Of the Slavonic New Testament, which is a verbal translation from the Greek, there are still preserved, in the library belonging to the Holy Synod in Moscow, copies which were written in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. This valuable collection of Slavonic and Greek Manuscripts was not destroyed at the burning of the city in 1812.

Of the character of that idolatry which prevailed among the Russians before they embraced Christianity, I have endeavoured to collect some information from native authors, which, with my own observations on many traces of it still preserved in the songs and usages of the people, I shall here subjoin.

That this powerful branch of the human family, the Slavonic, is very ancient, must appear from this fact alone, that for upwards of 1500 years they have occupied nearly the same countries; yet though at no great distance from the most civilized nations, they have, in general, partaken but little of superior culture. They are spread over the eastern countries of Europe, and extend, in some parts, to the very centre of it. This family of tribes, at the present day, contains upwards of 60,000,000 souls.†

Like most heathen nations, they formerly worshipped idols of stone, wood, and metal, in groves and on high places. This is to be seen in their earliest records; but whether they had temples, and a regular class of priests, like their neighbours the Greeks, seems doubtful. The Metropolitan Platon, and other writers, think they had not.

1. Their chief idol was named Perun, "the Destroyer." He was considered the god of thunder and lightning. His image was composed of different materials: his body, of wood; his head, of silver; his ears and mustachios, of gold; his legs, of iron; and in his hand he grasped a thunderbolt adorned with jaspers. A fire was kept perpetually burning in his presence; and if at any time, through the negligence of the priests, it was suffered to go out, they were punished by death for the crime. At his altar were sacrificed oxen, and prisoners of war; and also, occasionally, free people. Judging by his image and reputed attributes, authors are almost unanimous in comparing him to the Zeus of the Greeks, and Jupiter of the Romans.

The chronologer Nestor speaks of a secondary class of deities worshipped by the Slavonians; such as, Kors, Dajbog, Stribog, Semarglo, Moksha, &c.; but he gives no further details concerning them. It is worthy of remark, however, that in two of these names we find the word "bogh," which is the word still universally used by the Russians to designate the Supreme Being. It is a silly notion which some authors have entertained, that this appellation is derived from the river Bugh, or Boristhenes; for the Slavonians had given this name to gods and idols which they worshipped, before ever they were acquainted with this river, as the above designations of some of their deities shew. The most probable derivation of the word is either from Boi, "to destroy," or from Bogat, "rich." I am inclined to think it proceeds from the latter; though the first word certainly has a meaning nearly corresponding to that of Perun.

According to Mr. Strikofski, a Polish author, Perun was the chief deity. After him came

- 2. Mokosh—thought to have been the god of strength and of battles, answering to the Mars of the Romans. The Novogorodians worshipped an idol of this deity, whose head was like that of an ox.
- 3. Voloss—the Anubis of the Egyptians, and the Pan of the Greeks. The name is evidently derived from the word Vol, which signifies "an ox:" he was the guardian deity of cattle. It is supposed that his head was that of a dog.

Even in some of the churches there is still to be found the picture of a mighty warrior with a head like that of a hound; and this is supposed to be a relique of the ancient favourite deity of the Russian peasantry, Voloss. Also, in the present Russian Kalendar, there is a saint named Vlasik, the guardian of the flocks and herds, and to whose protection the common people still recommend them; and on their first going out to graze, in spring, the picture of this saint is carried in grand procession. There is not the smallest doubt but this saint took the station of the ancient heathen deity; for his very name is derived from the same root, and his peculiar charge is the same.

- 4. Pozvizd, or Pohvist—the god of the winds, rains, and storms, was worshipped by the Kiovians: he is supposed to have ranked with the Grecian Æolus, but no information remains respecting the worship paid to him. His name signifies the "whistler," or "blower."
- 5. Hors—which seems to answer to the Bacchus of the Romans: others again hold him to have been the Æsculapius of the Greeks.
- 6. Kupalo—supposed to be the god of the seas, Neptune. He was represented by the image of an old man with a white beard and a crown of rushes. Horses were offered on his altar.
- 7. Lada—the Venus of the Greeks. Lada was the mother of
 - 8. Leli-the Cupid of the Greeks; and of
 - 9. Poleli-the god of matrimony, Hymen.

To these three latter deities not only prayers were offered, but virgins, children, youths, and old men, were devoted in sacrifice. The attachment of the Russians to these three imaginary beings was so rooted and general, that even to the present day their names are daily heard in the amorous and bridal songs of every village.

- 10. Dajbog, Dashuba, or Dajbo, was the god of riches—The Plutus of the Greeks.
- 11. Striba, or Stribog the god of the winds; and seems to be the same as Pozvizd. In an ancient warsong, the winds are called the cousins of Striba.
 - 12. Pogoda—the Zephyrus of the Greeks.
- 13. Koliada.—Some take him to have been the Janus of the Romans, or god of peace; and others, the god of festivity. His image stood here in Kief; and the inhabitants used to worship him, with great feastings, on the 24th of December.
- 14. Oslad, or Uslad, was another deity worshipped by the people of this city. He was the god of mirth and enjoyment, as his very name intimates. Among the images of their deities overthrown by Vladimir I. was that of Uslad.

In addition to these deities, the heathen Slavonians had their Nymphs, called Rusalki; Satyrs, Leshie; Genii, Domovoi; and Centaurs, Polkani.

The stories of each family circle respecting the recent exploits of the Domovoi are endless; and symptoms of the powerful influence which superstitious ideas have over their minds and actions are to be seen and heard almost every hour of the day. Seldom a night passes but the Domovoi has been playing his pranks in some hut of the village: nor are the domestics of the nobles, especially the female part of them, less assured of his power over the horses and cows of their master's stall. They style him the "landlord" of the house; and use many strange ceremonies in order to court his favour and remain on good terms with him. Every occurrence which is not easily to be accounted for is attributed to the Domovoi.

The traditionary tale, which has evidently passed through a Christian channel, concerning the origin of these different classes of familiar spirits runs thus:—
"When Satan, for his pride, was cast down from heaven with all his associates, some of them fell into the rivers, some into woods, others into the fields; and some, by the Divine permission, remained in the clouds. Those who inhabit the dreary forests are the Leshie, who seek to mislead weary wanderers, by changing the position of objects which they had chosen as marks to point out their way. The Vodianiki are the Nymphs of the streams; the Rusalki are the Nymphs of the groves; and the Domovois are inmates in the habitations of mankind."

The bugbear or hobgoblin of the Russian nurse is called Buka. There is not a child who is able to distinguish his right hand from his left but is acquainted with some fearful and strange story concerning him. He is represented with a large mouth, and a very long tongue, which he uses as the elephant does his proboscis. He catches children with it, and throws them into his mouth. He walks about the doors of the huts, and in churchyards, in the night-time; and hence the fearful warning of the matron of the cottage to the young, "Ne hodi! tam Buka: Buka isest"—"Go not there! the Buka is there: he will eat you."

15. Svetovid, or Sviatovid, was a chief deity among the Slavonians, Wends, and Bohemians. He was the god of glory and war. His name signifies "holy light," "all-seeing." Some have supposed that the sun was represented by this idol.

16. Triglava—the Diana of the Slavonians, or the Trimurti of the Brahmins. Her image had three heads, which is the signification of the word Triglava. At Kief, she had a temple in an adjoining field; and was also worshipped by the Bulgarians and Vandals, or Wends. The Slavonians called her Zevan, and supplicated her for success in hunting.

- 17. Martzana—the goddess of harvest.
- 18. Seva, Siva, or Siba—the Pomona of the Slavonians. She was represented as a virgin, whose hair was her only covering. She had a wreath upon her head, held an apple in her right hand, and in her left a bunch of grapes. This seems to be the same deity as the Indian Schiva, and possesses the same attributes.
- 19. Bel-bog was considered as a good deity, for the word signifies "white god;" and
- 20. Cherno-bog, an evil god; as the name signifies a "black god."

That sacrifices were offered to Perun and other gods, is certain; but what particular kinds of animals or fruits of the earth, and with what ceremonies, and by whom, and how frequently, is not known. But that human sacrifices were offered, is left on record; for Tatischeff has stated that Vladimir I. with his men, on returning victorious to Kief from a war against the Tatregs, in 983, sacrificed many of the prisoners and many cattle to the idols.

The remains of this heathenism are still numerous among the people; some of which we have elsewhere instanced; and shall here bring forward a few more usages, which are evidently of pagan origin, though now united to what are called Christian festivals.

In spring, the Russians have their Bacchanalia, which they call Semika—a remnant of the worship of Tora, the god of lasciviousness. Formerly the females of Kief used to assemble, and proceed in company to an adjoining grove where the idol stood, dancing and singing lewd songs, and carrying branches decorated with strips of cloth of different colours: and then a scene of shameless wantonness was exhibited, in every respect similar to what takes place in Hindostan at the present day. After these lewd ceremonies were ended, the young females threw their branches into the river; and if they swam, it was taken as an omen that they were to be married during the year; but if they sank, it was considered as an omen to the contrary. Nor are these rites yet abolished: they continue in full force at the present day: only the idol is wanting, and a little more modesty is observed by the performers. In every town and village in Russia proper, from the first day of Pentecost till the Sunday following, a whole week, the walls and floors of the churches and houses are adorned with branches and flowers, and the maidens dance in companies, with a decorated branch carried in the midst of the groupe; and perform a variety of gesticulations, accompanied with songs usual on such occasions. Even in the streets of Petersburg these ancient Saturnalian rites are performed by companies of young females, who are gazed at with delight and wonder by the surrounding mob, without perhaps one in a hundred, either of the actors or spectators, knowing any thing of their origin.

Again: about midsummer, before the cutting of the hay, they had a great festival in honour of Vesta or the "unquenchable fire." A remnant of this heathen feast is still attached to the Festival of the Birth of John the Baptist, which is celebrated on the 24th of June, o. s. In the night preceding St. John's Day, the youth of both sexes assemble in the streets of the towns and villages, and make large fires, which they designate Kupalnitzi (baths). Around these they dance and play, singing songs, and springing through the fire, which they call bathing. In Little Russia the same ceremonies are observed; and the actresses sing, while springing around and through the fire, "Kapala na Ivana, da kupavsa Ivan, da iv vodu upav," &c. "I have bathed on St. John's Day, and fallen into the waters." On this ominous night the calves are allowed to spend the night with the cows, for fear that witches might dry up their milk; and the windows of the huts are all carefully garnished with nettles.

The heathen Russians had a distinguished feast-day at the end of harvest, in honour of all the gods, and in gratitude for the fruits of the earth. On this occasion, Lada and her son Leli (Venus and Cupid) were specially honoured; for most marriages took place at that time. Now it is evident that the present custom among the peasantry, of almost universally celebrating their marriages at this season of the year, before St. Philip's Fast, must be a remnant of this ancient heathen usage.

The great heathen festival called Kaliada, which took place among their ancestors on the last days of December, answered exactly to the Roman Saturnalia. present, it is united to the Feast of the Nativity, and is called Sviatki. On the eve of this festival, before the appearing of the moon and stars, the women, young and old, fasting, used to assemble in the streets, and invoked Kaliada in hymns. This heathen rite of invoking the powers of heaven, like the ancient Egyptians on the same festival, is, in substance, still continued among the people, especially in Little Russia. On the eve of the festival of Christmas, they fast till the stars are seen; and on the luminaries of the night making their appearance, they call upon Kaliada in songs. This continues for three nights, and then the Saturnalia or Sviatki begin; during which the youths of all ranks, in almost every house, are masked, and unite in dancing and play, or in evening parties; at which enigmatical songs are sung, and many youthful tricks and gambols played off. They go and hearken at the windows of their neighbours; they pour melted wax or lead into water, and divine, from the figure it assumes, what their future fortune is to be; &c. &c.

In almost every hut in Little Russia, on Christmas Eve, they place a large earthern pot, filled with boiled wheat or barley, before the domestic altar or pictures of the saints: this mess they call Kut;—and in another earthen pot they put dried apples, pears, plums, cherries, and raisins: these are properly stoned, and then placed before the images: this mess is called Uzvar. During the whole week of the festivity, the family, after dinner and supper, partake of part of this prepared food.

In the evening of Christmas-day, companies of both sexes go from house to house, and chaunt their rural songs under the windows, serenading the inmates of the cottage, who usually give them a small gratuity in return. This is called Koliadavat: and all the days of this festivity are still known among the common people by the name of Koliadi.

The Russians are accustomed to bathe themselves after the Sviatki or the Feast of Epiphany (the 6th of January), notwithstanding the frost and snow, even at the risk of their lives. Though now styled "the Benediction of the Water," this is, no doubt, a kind of purifying rite, in imitation of the offerings of purification customary among the Egyptians after the impurities of the Saturnalia.* In addition to the above, there are still many other superstitious practices resorted to during

^{*} There are two occasions, on which they "sanctify the waters." First, the great sanctification, usually performed in a river or stream, is done in remembrance of Our Lord's baptism: hence the place where it is performed the Sviatki, in universal repute among the villagers. For instance: they take a sitting hen from her eggs, and bring her into the midst of the cottage circle, and, laying a certain number of grains of wheat or some other corn before her, divine their fortunes thereby. What is this, but the alectoromancy of the ancient Greeks? Dropping the white of an egg into pure spring water, they also divine from its colour and the form it takes: this is the hydromancy of the Greeks.

Many heathenish usages are also still preserved in the numerous ceremonies attending the burial of the dead. Nestor, the father of all the Russian historians, says that it was the custom of the ancient Slavonians to burn their dead: this therefore was a practice which they had in common with their neighbours the ancient Greeks, and with the far-distant Brahmins. But the Sarmatians committed the bodies of their dead to the earth: and raised over the graves of their chiefs, Tumuli, or, as they are styled by the Russians, Kurgani, of different sizes, according to the rank and merits of the deceased. This practice was found prevalent among the Russians on their becoming Christians, and accounts for the great number of tumuli which I have observed in every part of European Russia, but especially in the extensive plains and steppes of the southern provinces. Tatischeff says, that in 1710 he himself saw the Kurgan or sepulchre of the Grand Prince Igor, who was killed by the Drevliens in 945, and buried near the ancient city of Corosten, the capital of the Drevliens, which was situated in the present province of Volhinia, upon the performed is called "Jordan:" in most churches it takes place once a year. The lesser sanctification is performed when the priests are in need of water for baptism or any other sacred purpose; but, generally, the Russians make little use of holy water.

River Ouchi. The Grand Princess Olga, wife of the said Igor, having embraced the Christian faith, gave the following directions to her son Sviatoslav respecting her funeral:—"Bury me according to the rites of Christians; do not heap upon my body a high mound of earth; and hold not feasts for the dead in remembrance of me, as the heathens do." Olga died in 955.

These feasts for the dead are called, in the ancient Slavonian language, Trizni, which Tatischeff thinks to be a word of Sarmatic origin. They consisted of an annual feast given by the surviving relations in memory of the deceased, at which sacrifices were offered, and the relations and friends of the departed feasted and drank to excess. Such feasts are still common among the Tartars also, under the name of Atawa.

When the Russians embraced Christianity, they of course conformed by degrees to the example set them by the Grand Princess Olga in regard to funeral ceremonies; and the rites and usages, common among the Greeks of the tenth century, were henceforth adopted by them. Olga is generally accounted the first of the nation who became a Christian; but neither this pious and heroic princess, nor the new converts, were aware that they were changing one set of heathen funeral rites for another, though under a Christian name: for the numerous burial ceremonies of the Christian Greeks of the tenth century were nearly the same that had been used by their heathen ancestors fifteen hundred years before that period; and these, substantially, continue in full force among both the Greeks and Russians of the present day.

As soon as a Russian dies, the corpse is immediately washed with lukewarm water; the members of the body are all placed in their natural position, the eyelids and lips carefully closed, his best wearing apparel is put on, and the body is placed upon a bier—in an empty room, among the rich—and below the sacred pictures, in the huts of the poor. The Psalms are read over it night and day; until it is removed to the church on the day of interment, accompanied by the clergy, carrying pictures of the saints in their hands, and by the nearest friends, and a chorus of singers, who chaunt psalms as the procession moves slowly along the streets. At the church, the burial-service, some parts of which are most pathetic and beautiful, is read over the body; after which the relatives and friends embrace the corpse, and, asking forgiveness (as they express themselves), take their last farewell. During the whole ceremony, and service in the church, the countenance is uncovered, and the head decorated with a crown made of gilt paper, or some more costly material, according to the condition of the deceased. At the shutting of the coffin, that which has been ridiculously styled the passport, after being read over the corpse by the officiating priest, is put into the hand of the deceased. Concerning the contents and intent of this, travellers have given very contradictory accounts: I therefore subjoin a literal translation from the Slavonian formula now used among the Russians.

PRAYER OF ABSOLUTION

TO BE READ OVER THE BODY OF THE DECEASED, BY THE BISHOP OR PRIEST.

"Our Lord Jesus Christ, by His divine grace, and by His gift and power given to His holy Disciples and Apostles to bind and loose the sins of men, said unto them, 'Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained; and whatsoever ye shall bind and loose on earth, shall be bound and loosed in heaven.' And from them upon us lineally descended. may this (through me the humble) be accomplished, and this my spiritual son N. N. be absolved from all sins that a man commits against God in word or deed or thought, by all his senses, willingly or unwillingly, wittingly or unwittingly. And if he be under the curse or excommunication of a bishop or priest, or have brought upon himself the curse of his father or mother, or fallen under his own curse, or have broken his oath. or committed any other sin by which a man is bound. but of all of which he has with a contrite heart repented, may he be absolved from all these sins and bonds! And on account of the weakness of nature, may they be cast into oblivion, and all forgiven him for the sake of His love to man, and through the , prayers of our most holy and blessed Queen, Mother of God, and immaculate Virgin Mary, the holy, glorious, and ever-to-be-praised Apostles, and all saints. Amen!"

" Price 20 kopiks."

Most probably this usage was substituted by the Greeks for the heathen custom of putting into the mouth of the deceased a small piece of money, called Obolus ($O\betao\lambda o_S$), the sixth part of a drachm, for the purpose of paying Charon for passage over the Styx.

The common people have a singular manner of announcing the death of any one: they very rarely say, in plain terms, Such-a-one is dead; but "N. N. sends his respects to you, and wishes you long life;" that is, N. N. is deceased.

The better classes of the Russians dress in black, and mourn for their departed friends in the manner of other European nations: nor is this a new custom among them; for Tatischeff says that mention is made of it as early as the ninth century.

It is still the practice among all ranks, but especially the lower, to weep and make loud lamentations over their dead, uttering unconnected sentences in their praise. During the funeral procession their excess of grief frequently discovers itself in this way. But to hire mourners for the express purpose of acting a part on such occasions is not usual in Great Russia; and in Little Russia this mode of publicly expressing grief is nearly done away with.

Formerly they interred their dead in and around the churches, as in other countries of Europe; until a ukaz of the 31st of December, 1731, set aside this practice, and ordered that throughout the empire, in all the cities and towns, common burying-places should be prepared, at a considerable distance from the towns, and that, in future, no more corpses should be laid in or near the In 1772 this regulation was further enchurches. forced, and permission was granted to erect particular churches and chapels in these new burying-grounds, in which funeral rites and prayers for the dead could be performed more conveniently than at the parish churches. Since that period, very few, even of the rich, are interred in or near the parish churches: but this prohibition does not extend to monasteries.

It is, however, time to return from this long digression upon the ancient and modern heathenish customs of the Kiovians, in order to speak of their present state; and therefore I again take up the thread of my journal notes.

. Christmas-day (according to the old style, still used in Russia) is ushered in by the ringing of bells, and public service in all the churches, towards which the inhabitants, in their best attire, were seen flocking at an early hour.

About 10 o'clock, I went and saw part of the ceremony at the ancient cathedral of the Layré. The singing was excellent. In general, the Russians are gifted with a good ear for music, and are fond of singing. Vocal music alone is used in the services of the Church: and on this account it has been cultivated from the very first introduction of Christianity among them. So early as the year 1053, the metropolitan Georgius brought with him from Constantinople three singers, with their families, for the express purpose of giving instruction in sacred music; and it is stated in Russian history, that these men taught them to sing in octaves. Church music is still cultivated with great care; and the records of this science, as preserved in the Russian monasteries, might open an interesting field of research, respecting the ancient anthems sung in the Eastern Church in the ninth and tenth centuries.

The Ritual, or Service, of the Russian Church is contained in upwards of twenty volumes folio, all in the Slavonic tongue; which, though perhaps better understood by the people and merchants than by the great bulk of the nobility, whose education is foreign, is nevertheless so ancient, that, though many expressions have been from time to time modernized, it is not perfectly understood by the nation generally.

Twelve of these volumes, one for every month, contain the special services and hymns for the festivals of the saints, which are more numerous in the Russian Kalendar than the days of the year. These twelve volumes are called the Menxon (Mnvañov).

The Octoëchoi ('Οκτωῆχοι) compose two volumes; and, as their name denotes, are divided into eight tones or voices, each of which contains hymns for the days of one week, that are introduced into the service according to the subjects to which these days are appropriated. Thus: Sunday to the Resurrection; Monday to the Angels; Tuesday to John the Baptist; Wednesday to the Virgin; Thursday to the Apostles; Friday to the Passion of Christ; and Saturday to the Saints and Martyrs. To these two there is a supplementary volume, containing hymns to supply the deficiencies in the Mention.

The Psalter and Hours take up another volume.

The Book of Psalms is divided into twenty parts, one of which is read at a service; so that the whole is read through in the course of a week.

The Book of Prayer contains the ordinary daily prayers and petinias for the priest and deacon, at the vespers, matins, and communion service.

The Fast Triods are two volumes, which contain particular services for the great fasts.

The Four Gospels compose another volume, a portion of which is read, always in a distinct and audible voice, at every service.

The Book of Offices contains the rites of baptism, marriage, &c. &c.; and the Book of Regulations contains instructions how to use the rest.

The service begins in the evening of the preceding day, as among the Jews; the vespers at sunset; the matins betwixt four and five in the morning; and the liturgy or communion-service betwixt nine and ten.

The greater part of the service consists of psalms and hymns, which, according to the Regulations, ought to be sung, but are now mostly read: and the length of the service has given rise to the very unintelligible manner in which it is now performed; for the priests and readers, in order to get the more quickly through it, either read two parts at a time, or read in such a tone of voice, and so fast, that it is impossible for the congregation to understand. In this case, it is no better than the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal, in the ears of the people.

Scarcely any rite or ordinance is performed in the Greek Church, whether by day or night, without lighted candles and lamps. In many of the churches, lamps and candles are kept constantly burning before pictures of the Saviour and the Virgin, and of the saint to which the church is dedicated.

The robes in which the priests officiate are made of the most costly silks and velvets; and generally are of gay colours, sumptuously embroidered with gold, and many of them loaded with pearls and precious-stones. These sacerdotal garments belong to the churches, and are usually presents from the nobility and merchants. Many of them are also made of the palls used to cover the coffins at the funerals of the rich, which, after the interment, are bestowed as a present to the church to which the deceased belonged.

They burn a great deal of incense during the service. The censer is made of silver, in the form of a cup, and slung upon three small chains of the same metal: it is filled with live coal, and the incense is put upon it at different times, when the priest perfumes the worshippers, the iconostases, and the altar, by waving it to and fro.

Prostration and crossing are frequently practised by the Greeks, as well as the Roman Catholics. Thus, the Russian always crosses himself before and after meat when about to begin any matter of importance, as to pass a river, or begin a journey—on passing a church—when the thunder roars, or the lightning flashes: on every such occasion he devoutly uncovers his head, bows, and crosses himself, and repeats some short prayer suitable to the circumstances. They also prostrate themselves very frequently during prayer, whether in public or private.

From the church, I went and called upon the archimandrite Antonie. He was giving a collation to all the monks and servants of his monastery, which is considered the most holy and ancient in Russia, through its connection with the sacred catacombs or caves. A large table was richly piled with dishes of dried and salted fish, of which there seemed to be an inconceivable variety; also with brandy and wine in abundance. All who came in bowed respectfully, and congratulated Antonie on the holidays: they were then invited to eat and to drink; after which they approached and received the benediction of their superior, and departed. From the first in rank to the meanest servant in the monastery, in number about 200, all ate and drank, and received the benediction.

Antonie conversed with me on the affairs of the Kief Bible Society; invited me to partake of the sakuska, as the collation is called; and civilly replied to my inquiries about the establishment under his charge.

In the evening, I made the acquaintance of the senior priest of the cathedral church of St. Sophia, Michaelofsky, a learned and most respectable character, and a friend to the distribution of the Scriptures. The Bible Society, however, was not much patronised by the archimandrite Antonie and the whole chapter of the monks, because a considerable part of their revenues had been cut off by the issue of so many cheap Bibles and Testaments from Petersburg and Moscow. Bibles printed in their office, in the monastery of the Lavré, were generally accounted more correct than those printed elsewhere, and were sold dear; but since the stereotype editions of the Bible Society appeared, this sale has been very inconsiderable.

I afterwards visited the famous printing-office of this monastery—an excellent establishment, and in good order. It contained seven presses, which are constantly employed in printing Church books: there is also a type-foundry attached to it. The number of workmen employed was forty-three. It is only here, and in the synodal printing-offices of Moscow and Petersburg, that ecclesiastical works are published for the use of the 26,747 churches of the Greek communion throughout the empire. The printing-office at Moscow employs nearly 500 men; that of St. Petersburg only a few.

The monastery itself is a most extensive range of buildings, all of brick, and has a massive elegant cathedral, with a belfry of great beauty of architecture, 43\frac{1}{2} sageens high (3041 feet). Within the walls, in addition to the cathedral and printing establishment, are, the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, with the refectory of the monks; the Church of the Holy Trinity; a hospital, with a chapel attached to it; the Church of All Saints; and the cells of the monks and archimandrite; all encompassed by a high wall, 550 fathoms in length. This famous monastery takes the name of Pestchersky from the sacred caverns near it, in which the bodies of many of their saints are The buildings are erected on the hilly bank deposited. of the Dnieper, and present, at a distance, a most interesting group of fine edifices, with gilded domes, spires, The whole number of churches in Kief. and crosses. not including the monasteries, is thirty. One of these, dedicated to St. Andrew, is built upon the spot where that apostle, about the year 35, is said to have arrived from Cherson, to have planted a cross on the banks of the Dnieper, and preached the Christian faith. This traditionary tale, however, rests upon evidence not more satisfactory, than that of the apostle Paul's having first preached the Gospel in Britain.

If we except the Spiritual Academy, of which I shall speak hereafter, there are few other public buildings in Kief of any importance. The streets are generally broad, and the houses built of block-wood, one or two stories high, with courts and out-houses attached to them, in the usual Russian style. Some of these have the under story of brick. The town has often been plundered and burnt down, in the contests between its successive masters, the Poles, the Lithuanians, and the Russians. principal commerce is with Moscow and Odessa. It has a number of leather manufactories, potteries, and a foundry for bells. The police-master stated the number of the inhabitants to be 30,000. He also accompanied me to see the ostrog or prison; a square building of brick, one story high, divided into seven rooms, and surrounded by a court encompassed with strong high walls. In the first corner of the court is the kitchen, in the second the bath, in the third a small hospital which was crowded with sick, and in the fourth a store-house: there is a draw-well in the court. The prison itself we found crowded with inmates: in the first two rooms, to the left, were confined seventy-two vagrants, all huddled together into a very small space: they looked dirty, ragged, emaciated, and miserable. The remaining five apartments were also full to excess. In one of them were sixteen females: in the other rooms, here and there, a female, with her husband, was seen in the crowd. They each received 10 kopicks from Government for food, and for the rest depended upon the gifts of the charitable. There was not room properly to accommodate more than sixty or seventy persons in the whole prison; and we found in it not fewer than 223!! The police-master lamented that he had it not in his power to ease the lot of these poor sufferers. In the day-time they are allowed to walk in the court; but how they find room and air to breathe in the night-time, is beyond my conception!

From the ostrog we proceeded to the town hospital, situated in a fine airy place without the city, on the banks of the river. It consists of two moderate-sized wooden buildings, divided into eight rooms each. There were only eighty patients: nearly one half of the beds were empty. The air was good, and the walls and floors clean: the whole establishment seemed kept in good order, and looked respectable.

Dec. 26th.—About eight in the morning, I went to see the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, in the old city. Here, at one of the altars in the upper story, I found the Protoiré Michaelofsky performing the liturgy. word liturgy signifies the communion-service. Liturgy of St. Chrysostom is in daily use in the Russian Church: in which, as in the Church of Rome, the officiating priest communicates every day. The laity seldom partake of the communion more than once a year, which is always during the great fast before Easter; but there are many of the more serious who partake of the ordinance oftener. The eucharist is administered also to infants: for as soon as any one is baptized, at whatever age, he is admitted to this sacrament. The bread which they use is leavened: it is made into small round loaves about the size of a tea-cup, which are consecrated and divided into portions, with great ceremony and many prayers. communicants receive the elements in both kinds standing, the bread being sopped in the cup. A little warm water is mixed with the wine, probably in reference to

Confession always precedes communion. It was formerly the practice of the priests to make very particular inquiries of the person who came to confess, urging the necessity of uncovering the wounds in order to have them healed: but this custom is now less enforced: the priest now usually repeats the Ten Commandments, and asks the person which of them he has broken. After confession, he prays, "that Jesus Christ our Lord and God, through His grace, bounty, and love to mankind, may forgive N. N. all his sins;" from which he then absolves him. " in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The people commonly confess in the church, at the altar, one by one, to their spiritual father; but persons of distinction send for the priests to come and receive their confessions in their own houses.—Three infants, in the arms of their mothers, received the sacrament: the bread was soaked in the wine in a cup, and given with a spoon—the usual way of administering this ordinance.

After the service, the Protoiré led me through this massive and ancient building; a kind of double cathedral, with twelve altars in the under story, and eight in the upper one. It was founded in 1037, by Jaroslaff the son of Vladimir, on the spot where he conquered the Petchenegs. It is rich in sacred robes, and vessels of gold and silver, for the service; and its walls and pillars are hung round with sacred pictures, many of which are covered with precious metals and other valuable decorations. There is a marble monument of the founder, considered in Russia a great rarity; as it is the only one of the kind in the country, and was probably brought from Constantinople. The dome and walls over the great altar or Holy of Holies are richly wrought in mosaic, in imitation of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and, though 800 years old, are still fresh and well preserved. The building was originally in the form of a cross, in exact imitation of the Byzantine St. Sophia; and internally it still retains its ancient form, though the exterior is changed. It has eleven large domes or heads, and two small ones; and is 175 feet long, including the altar. The height of the walls is 44 feet. The sum appointed by Government, by a ukaz of Catherine II. of the 10th of April 1786, for the support of this most ancient cathedral in the empire, with its priests, deacons, and singers, is only 2058 roubles (861.) The following year she added 300 roubles (121.), to keep up its wardrobe.

On leaving the cathedral, we went and called on Serapion, the metropolitan of Kief and Galitz; an aged and most venerable-looking father, stooping under years, whose locks and beard were white as snow. He received me with urbanity and much unaffected kindness: he spoke with feeling of the Bible cause, for which I travelled; informed me that he was just going to officiate at the cathedral church of the Lavré monastery, of which he is the archimandrite; and invited me to meet him after the service.

In the mean time, I went, with my very kind and intelligent conductor, the Protoiré, and saw the Military Hospital, which is situated on a rising ground without the city, and is built in the form of a square, open at each angle, having a church in the centre of one of the sides. We found 664 sick soldiers, occupying 44 rooms or wards, and 30 more in several houses adjoining. I was delighted with the astonishing order, cleanliness, and apparently comfortable circumstances of so many sufferers, under the variety of diseases to which our sinful nature is subject. The buildings were of block-wood, the walls and floors all painted with oil-colours, and the air pure throughout. In one of the wards, the inmates complained that they did not well understand the Slavonic Testaments which had been sent to them. I accordingly arranged with Mr. Michaelofsky to get them a supply in the Modern-Russ and Polish languages, from the Kief Society, of which he is secretary. He afterwards wrote us a letter, stating that he had circulated 70 Testaments among these poor sick men, who had received them with great joy and gratitude.

We next went to see the sacred catacombs. are divided into two classes; the nearer, Pestcheri of St. Antonio; and the further, Pestcheri of St. Theodo-They consist of subterraneous excavations in the hard dry sand and clavev hills on the left bank of the Dnieper: the first being 637 feet, and the latter 1400 feet, Their origin is traced back to the time of Jaroslaff Vladimirovitch, in the beginning of the 11th century, when a presbyter named Hilarion dug himself a cave or cell in the side of one of the hills, which on his decease was inhabited by St. Antonio, on his return from Mount Athos, in 1017. His renowned piety attracted many visitors, some of whom chose to live with him; and thus the underground cells gradually increased. At last they consecrated one of them into a church, and turned the whole into a subterranean monastery. this family soon became too numerous for Antonio, who was fond of solitude; and therefore leaving the emmet monks in the first hill, he removed to another, separated from it by a deep ravine, and began a new work of excavation, which is now styled the nearer Pestcheri. where he lived till his death, and where his withered body is still preserved. It was this compartment of the caves which we first visited. The passage leading into them is above five feet wide, and eight feet high, cut straight into the solid clay, which is extremely dry and dense in its formation. As, with tapers in our hands, we passed along, winding in different directions, we came to the square cells of the monks of former times, now the sepulchral chambers of many of them: smaller niches in the passage are also occupied with bodies lying in open coffins, swaddled and dressed up in silks, with gloves on their hands, and shoes on their feet, of the most costly materials. The number of these mosches, as they are denominated, is 73: in some respects they resemble mummies; only that the latter have been embalmed, whereas these are preserved from falling into dust merely by the peculiar quality of the soil, and the dryness of the air in these caves, resembling that in the lower aisles of the cathedral churches of Bourdeaux and Bremen, where I have seen a number of bodies which have been preserved in a similar way, some of them for centuries. But the common belief of the Russians respecting these mosches, is, that they are the incorrupted bodies of the favourites of God; for they believe that the bodies of eminent saints, like that of the Saviour, "do not see corruption." Hence they affirm, that, after a course of years, the body of a favourite saint, as a mark of his being canonized in heaven, is, by a supernatural power, raised by degrees out of its grave, and at last appears above ground, incorrupt; and miraculous cures immediately begin to be wrought by it. Moscow, and other places, many of these mosches are preserved in the monasteries and churches; and are disclosed on holy days, to receive the acts of reverence and devotion paid to them by the ignorant and superstitious multitude. Peter I. did much to put a stop to this species of idolatry; but it is far from being set aside. In the year 1822, one of these wonder-working bodies made its appearance in one of the burialgrounds of Petersburg itself, under the very eye of the Government. The miracle was no sooner noised abroad, than the people flocked in thousands to the place; and the priests took money in pitchers-full, as was reported, for which the people got in return a little of the holy earth from the grave of the new saint. The deceitful practices of unprincipled priests, for the purpose of gaining money by imposing on the credulity of the ignorant, are numerous.—In all respects, the caves, chapels, niches and cells are not unlike the catacombs near Civita Vecchia, in the island of Malta, which I visited in 1819; and which seem also to have been originally inhabited by monks.

I was much interested by the mosche of Nestor, the most ancient of the Russian historians, a monk of the 11th century, who collected the traditionary records of his nation, reduced them into chronological order, and wrote the history of his own times in this cavern. Among these cells there are three small chapels, in one of which the late emperor, Alexander, erected a new and elegant gilt bronze iconostasis or altarpiece.

The names of the deceased are all marked over their cells and niches, with the year of their deaths, mostly in the 11th and 12th centuries.

On another occasion I descended into the Pestcheri of St. Theodosia, where we saw thirty-three mosches lying in state, dressed out like those above described. Here they also shew the scull of a saint which is said to sweat odoriferous ointment, renowned for curing diseases! The Jeromonach Arsenie, who is keeper of the Theodosian caverns, accompanied me in this second subterraneous excursion. Arsenie is of noble descent; he was formerly a gay man of the world, with which he at last became disgusted, and retired into the monastery.

From his conversation, I could observe that his mind was but partially enlightened; and he seemed to be very superstitious. Indeed his peculiar charge, that of the thirty-three skeletons now mentioned—in connection with the ceremonies and worship offered to them by the many thousands of pilgrims who every summer visit them from all parts of Russia—would not accord with the peace of an enlightened mind. A man must be either a hypocrite or an ignorant devotee, in order to be able to take part in such exercises without perpetual revoltings of reason and conscience. But Arsenie spoke eloquently on the wonderful cures performed on the pilgrims, by the application of a few drops of the odoriferous oil which oozes from the scull of the unknown saint.

In the case of Arsenie, we have an instance of what I believe frequently takes place, when the mind is roused on the subject of religion, but the individual is still unacquainted with the Gospel plan of salvation and has not the Word of God to guide it in that critical period: it then usually bounds from the extreme of infidelity to the extreme of superstition—from believing nothing that is supernatural, to believing every silly pretence to it; making no distinction between the miraculous displays of divine power recorded in the sacred volume, and the absurd stories with which the (so called) sacred legends of Greece and Rome are filled. The Russians have a popular work, called the "Tscheti-minei," consisting of twelve volumes in folio, a volume for every month, in which the lives of their saints and wonder-workers are set forth, and which are filled with all manner of pretended supernatural adventures: this work is a great favourite in the families of the merchants of the old school. It was principally translated from the Greek Legends by the metropolitan Dimitrie; to which he added the labours of Macarius, metropolitan of Moscow and all Russia, in the beginning of the 16th century, who wrote the lives of the Russian saints. It is observable, however, that in this immense work the Slavonic language appears in all its power, richness, and elegance: it is perhaps the richest mine of this tongue now extant. Dimitrie laboured upon it twenty years: the printing of it began in Baturin in the Ukraine in 1689, and was finished in Kief 1710.

About midday we repaired to the palace of the metropolitan in the Lavré, where we found him surrounded by the chief of the clergy and nobility of Kief, who had been attending the service, and were now come to congratulate him on the Christmas holidays. Here also I found a large table richly supplied with a cold collation of fish, wine, and brandy, with which his Eminence was refreshing his guests. Of these I partook with the company; and made the acquaintance of several of them, to whom Serapion introduced me.

I next went to see an aged monk, named Vasan, renowned for his wisdom and piety. He was formerly a common citizen, but, after the death of his wife, became a monk; and has by his wise counsels and pure manners risen to great reputation for sanctity. I found him in his cell, far advanced in years, and stone-blind; of middle stature, meagre in person, and his hair and beard blanched with age. On making myself known to him, he took me by the hand, and examined my body by the touch; then embracing me, cordially welcomed me to his cell. We sat down together, and conversed for an hour on the signs of the times, the spread of the Gospel, the labours of the Bible Society, &c. He remarked, that the Bible cause was stamped with the special approbation of the Almighty; that, in his estimation, the predictions of Jesus respecting the general spread of the Gospel among all nations were now being accomplished; and that Russia was a peculiarly favoured nation in the present day. I was delighted with the soundness of his judgment on every subject we touched upon, and the simplicity, cheerfulness, and openness of his manners. It is twenty years since he entered the monastery, and seventeen since he lost his sight. Among the seventy or eighty volumes which composed his library, I found the writings of several of the best Russian Theological authors; as, the works of Tichon Gadonskov, those of the metropolitan Michael, and several translations from Jung-Stilling's writings, and the Kief edition of the Slavonian Bible in five volumes. These are read to him by his friends, and the junior monks who visit him. On my taking leave, he saluted me with a kiss, and invoked many special blessings upon me and my labours.

From the cell of Vasan I went and saw the depôt of the Kief Bible Society, kept in one of the cells, containing 1959 copies of Bibles and Testaments. The subscriptions during the year had been 6831 roubles: the distribution, 248 copies, nearly all of them sold. I next went to the metropolitan's, to dinner. Here I met all the principal clergy of Kief; the greater part of them were habited as monks. The venerable metropolitan, after introducing me to them, gave me a beautiful copy of the Kief edition of the Slavonian Testament, bound in two volumes, in a red Morocco case; also a small volume on the history and antiquities of Kief, covered with green silk; and a plan of the Lavré monastery and Pestcheri, printed on a square of yellow silk. There were thirty of us who sat down to table: it was covered with a variety of fish, boiled, broiled, and made into soup, and in all manner of forms; for the regular clergy are interdicted the use of flesh of every kind. We were also treated with excellent light wines and other liquors.

The metropolitan, and several of the archimandrites who sat near me, seemed to be extremely interested with the particulars I gave them respecting the condition of their brethren whom I had lately visited in Greece and Turkey. On the subject of our Society, and its efforts to supply all nations with the word of life, the sentiment which flowed from the mouths of all was this-" that the cause of the Bible Society is the cause of God, and is fraught with incalculable blessings to man." The conversation was kept up with much dignity and interest by the aged prelate; and both he and the other clergy answered freely to all the inquiries I had to make, concerning the history and present state of Kief, its churches. schools, and clergy: to which subjects I shall, in my next chapter, call the attention of my readers, embodying in my remarks such information as I have collected from their writers, from personal intercourse with the clergy, and from my own observation.

Government of the Russian Church in ancient times—Power of the Patriarchs—Patriotism of Hermogenus, Patriarch of all Russia—Privileges and Rights of the Clergy—their power and wealth—Immorality of the Monks and Nuns—Abolition of the Patriarchate, and establishment of the Synodal Government—Fall of the Clergy—their impoverishment—Seraphim, present Metropolitan of Petersburg and Novogorod—Character of the Regular and Parochial Clergy—their domestic habits, and stipends—Education of the Clergy—Spiritual Academy and Seminary of Kief—Universities and Schools—Narrow limits of Education among the Russians.

From the time of the introduction of Christianity into Russia by Greek Missionaries in the ninth century, the Russian Church remained under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Constantinople for about 600 years, and in its doctrines, discipline, and ceremonies was in all respects regulated by the Mother Church. But for the better management of its concerns, (Constantinople being at such an immense distance from the principal cities of Russia, Kief, Novogorod, and Pleskoff,) the patriarch had a kind of patriarchal-vicar, who was named Metropolitan of all Russia, in whose hands were vested the general concerns of the Church; while the bishops were free and independent administrators of the affairs of their respective dioceses. At first they were supported by the tithe, which Vladimir the Great granted them. They were chosen by lot: three candidates being presented by the suffrages of the clergy and people, their names were put into a bag; and, prayers having been offered up, the metropolitan, in the midst of the assembled clergy, put in his hand, and drew forth the first name. In this manner Sergie was chosen Archbishop of Novogorod, in 1482; and it is known that, in the present day, the Emperor Alexander has sometimes resorted to the same method of deciding by lot, when difficult cases occurred, in which he was afraid of determining wrong.

From the year 1588 until the time of Peter the Great, the Russian Church was governed by its own patriarchs. Their number was ten. The last was Hadrian, who died in 1700.*

The influence and power of the patriarchs was so great, that even the Tzars were called upon to demean themselves on certain ceremonial days before them. When, for instance, the Tzar partook of the sacrament in the cathedral church, he stood dressed in the habit of

* LIST OF THE RUSSIAN PATRIARCHS.

1. Jos, metropolitan of Moscow, was ordained Patriarch of all Russia, by Jeremiah, patriarch of Constantinople, on the 26th of January 1589. He was driven from his throne by Grishka, and took refuge in the town of Staritz; where he died, in the monastery there, on the 8th of March 1604, having reigned 16 years, 1 month, and 8 days.

The Pseudo-patriarch Ignatius, bishop of Mezan, succeeded to the patriarchal dignity in 1605. He was a Greek by birth; and was raised to this office by Grishka, without consecration; who also married him to Mary, his beloved: but Vasilli Joanovitch Schniski expelled them both.

- 2. Hermogenus, archbishop of Kazan and Astrachan, was raised to this dignity, by his own metropolitan, in 1606; and suffered an unnatural death from the Poles in 1612, after reigning 6 years, 9 months, and 21 days.
 - 3. PHILARET, raised to the patriarchal throne 1619, and died 1634.
- 4. Joseph, bishop of Pleskoff, by his own metropolitan, in 1634; and died in 1642.

5. Josephus, a deacon.—On Palm Sunday, when the patriarch went in procession to the Place of Execution, called, in Russ, Lobnoe Mesto, the Tzar led the patriarch's horse, walking by his side. Even Peter himself, in his youth, is said to have performed this humiliating ceremony. Karunozin, the historian, thus describes this ceremony:-" On Palm Sunday, before the service began, the inhabitants of Moscow being assembled in the Kremlin, the priests brought out of the Urpenskoy cathedral a large tree hung with different fruits—apples, raisins, figs, and dates; fixed it upon two sledges; and with it slowly commenced the procession. Under the branches of the tree stood five boys, dressed in white, singing psalms. A number of youths, with lighted wax-candles in their hands, and a large lantern upon a pole, followed the sledge. Behind them were carried two sacred flags, six censers, and six sacred ikons: the priests, more than a hundred in number, in the most splendid robes bestrewed with pearls, followed the images. Then came boiars and nobles, and at last the Tzar and metropolitan; the

- 6. Nikon, metropolitan of Novogorod, raised by his bishop, in 1652; degraded in 1667; and died 1680.
- 7. JOSEPHUS, an archimandrite, was ordained by the Patriarch of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch, in 1667; and died in 1672.
- 8. Peter, metropolitan of Novogorod, was raised to the patriarchate by his bishop, in 1672; and died 1673.
- 9. Joakim, metropolitan of Novogorod, was also made patriarch by his own bishop, in 1673; and died 1690.
- 10. Hadrian, metropolitan of Kazan, succeeded him, in 1690; and died 1700.

latter dressed in white, and riding sideways upon on ass In his left hand he held the Gospels, richly or horse. bound, with clasps of gold, resting upon his knee; and with his right he blessed the multitudes, as the procession moved along. The ass was held by a boiar; and the Tzar led it by the rein with one hand, and held a palm in the other. The path of the metropolitan was laid with cloth. Behind followed the rest of the boiars and courtiers, with an innumerable multitude of people. Thus they walked in procession round the principal churches in the Kremlin, and returned to the cathedral: and the metropolitan, having performed mass, gave a grand dinner to the Tzar and nobles."-On the feast of All Saints the metropolitan dined with the Tzar, and the latter stood at the table and served him.-No wonder, that ceremonies like these should mortify the pride of such an aspiring spirit as Peter I., and excite in him a determination to abolish for ever this rival But having said thus much for the sake of impartiality, I shall here introduce a few extracts of a letter from the present Metropolitan of Moscow, Philaret, who seemed to think that in a former publication I had not done the Russian patriarchs justice: and this I do the more readily, because the letter contains valuable information on other points connected with the Greek Church.

[&]quot; MY DEAR SIR.

[&]quot;Permit me to communicate to you, in accordance with your own desire, what struck me in reading certain parts of your work respecting the state of learning among the clergy of Russia.

must be added the seminary of Troitza (about seventy miles to the north of Moscow), a high school, which has had a distinguished part in the revival of learning among the clergy of Russia, in modern times. In the year 1812, when its great supporter, Platon, died, there were fourteen bishops and archbishops of the Russian Church, two of them metropolitans, who had received their education there, under that enlightened prelate.

"The course in the spiritual schools is at present as follows:-Several parishes have a common school for the children of the clergy: and these parochial schools are under the superintendence of the central district school, in which the children have to pass a course of four years. In this period they are taught the grammars of the Russ, Slavonian, Latin, and Greek languages; together with geography, sacred history, the catechism, and church-singing. The district schools are under the controul of the eparchial seminary, which is usually attached to the residence of the bishop of the see. You say that the choice and appointment of bishops depend on the will of the sovereign. The Russian Church is not of this opinion. She, in the choice of bishops, follows the practice of the first churches, in which this choice depended upon the clergy and laity unitedly *. But, the extent of the Russian Church being such, that not only the clergy of so many dioceses, but even the clergy and the people of one diocese could not have an opportunity of assembling to choose their bishop, therefore the choice is left to the synod, as representing the clergy,

^{*} This statement is confirmed by the manner in which the clergy in ancient times were elected by the suffrages of the people, who signified their approbation by crying out "A\xi\osigma\in\osigma\i and to the emperor, as representative of the people: and with a view to observe the order of election, and to prevent difference of opinion, the synod proposes to the emperor two candidates for the bishopric, and he appoints one of them.

"In Russia there are three kinds of monastic habitations-Lavri, Monasteries, and Hermitages. Three of the lavri have the metropolitans of the respective dioceses, where they are situated, for their archimandrites. Exclusive of the lavri, some of the monasteries, denominated stavrapegia, are placed under the immediate direction of the synod. The remainder of the monasteries and hermitages are under the jurisdiction of the bishops of the diocese. The monasteries are divided into three classes; of which the two first have archimandrites, and the third partly archimandrites and partly egoumens, over them. The hermitages are governed by superiors. In the lavri, and in most of the monasteries. the monks have a common table; but they must provide their clothing from their own salaries or private resources. In the hermitages they have no kind of personal property, and complete fraternal equality and obedience are strictly observed. I know not whence you have taken your ideas of the caprice of the former Russian patriarchs. The opinion, that the power of the clergy might be a dangerous opponent to the civil power. as it respects Russia, is a mere prejudice; though in the preceding century it had even taken hold of the minds of some Russian authors. It is wrong to compare the throne of the Pope with that of the Russian patri-The Russian hierarch never aspired after the triple tiara, and the sword which belongs unto Cæsar. The most zealous of them were witnesses of the truth before the throne of their sovereigns; and if for that they fell under their displeasure, they submitted without resist-Out of the small number of her patriarchs, the Russian Church has even had such as have suffered for the empire-Hermogenus:* but, thanks be to God! she never had any from whom the empire suffered. why then, you will say, did Peter change the patriarchal for the synodal government? The principal cause of this change was probably the following—that the power of the clergy, concentrated in the patriarch, might not oppose the rapidity of the other great changes which the ardent spirit of Peter had already undertaken; because it was a constant maxim of the Russian clergy, never to abandon, without important reasons, the ancient customs; and ever to beware of bringing the minds of the people into agitation by the introduction of novelties, the utility of which was not clearly manifest. If, for instance, he had asked the Russian clergy whether it were necessary for the civilization of the Russians to oblige them to dress like foreigners, and to cut off their beards. most likely the answer would have been-that short clothes do not civilize a man, neither doth a beard make him a barbarian; that from civilized foreigners we should adopt only that which is necessary and useful; but that we ought not to depress the national spirit with their fashions, and thereby accustom the people to a blind imitation merely; that it would be better to promote the sciences and arts by the gradual improvement of the Russians themselves, than to deliver up the spirit and powers of the people into the hands of foreigners.

^{*} In 1612, when Moscow was possessed and pillaged by the Poles, and the Russians rose under Minin and Pojarskoy to deliver it, the enemy called upon the Patriarch Hermogenus to oppose the approach of the Russians; but he, in the true spirit of a patriot, replied, "Blessed be the defenders of our native country, and may its enemies perish!" This so exasperated his enemies, that they put him in prison, and starved him to death: he died 17th of Feb. 1612. In the month of October of the same year, the Poles were driven from Moscow by the assembled forces of the Russian peasantry, in a way much resembling that in which Napoleon was compelled to abandon it in October 1812, exactly 200 years after.

"But the powerful and active spirit of Peter could not endure any limits or delay in the execution of his plans: he wished to change all things at once, forgetting that, according to the laws of nature, that only which grows up gradually is likely to be lasting and substantial.

"The Ober Procurator of the synod is by no means the head of it, as stated in your book. Not being of the clerical order, he is not even so much as a member of the synod. He is merely the guardian of the laws attached to the synod, a witness of its transactions on the part of the crown, and the medium of intercourse between it and the sovereign. Neither hath the senate any power over the synod: these two courts are on an equality.

"These are the remarks which appeared to me most necessary, on perusing your work.

"And for your just esteem of his late eminence, Platon, receive my special thanks, which are also for ever due to him; and be assured of the sincere and perfect esteem with which I have the honour to remain.

Your humble Servant,

" PHILARET, Archimandrite.

" St. Petersburg, Oct. 26, 1814."

There are three ranks of episcopacy in Russia—bishops, archbishops, and metropolitans. From the earliest ages they seem to have worn, when not officiating in their mitres, a high-crowned cap covered with white crape, with a veil of the same stuff attached to it, hanging down upon their shoulders. This, however, is now the distinguishing mark of a metropolitan. The archbishops and bishops wear black caps of the same form and materials. These three degrees of prelates are without distinction titled Archire, 'Apxiepeig, when spoken of; but when addressed, they are styled Preosviascheneischie Vladiko, "Eminent lord;" and the metropolitans and archbishops are styled Viesokopreosviascheneischie Vladiko, "Most high and eminent lord." The reader I hope will not take offence at my giving him such long words to articulate. I can assure him that it requires no small degree of study and practice before a foreigner acquires facility in applying such titles with gracefulness and propriety in conversation with these dignitaries. Before the time of Peter I. the bishops were absolute in their respective dioceses; and though at consecration they took an oath to walk, in the spirit of their office, according to the Holy Scriptures and Councils of the Fathers, yet Peter found it needful, in 1716, to make their duties and obligations more clear and specific, in an ordonnance, called "Spiritual Regulations," which refers to the judicious use of the power with which they are entrusted-personal conduct-strict cognisance of monks and clergy under them—the prevention of superfluous building of churches—their special duties towards their flock study of the Scriptures-establishment of schools, &c.

How far the first bishops of the Russian Church acted in the spirit of the Apostle, when he declared to the Corinthians, "I seek not yours but you," will be seen from the following historical facts respecting the revenues and power of the Russian priesthood in ancient times:—

The second metropolitan, Leontius, obtained for the clergy, from the royal convert Vladimir, such concessions as divested the sovereign of a great part of his own rights. "He granted to the clergy, throughout his whole dominions, the tithe of every kind of grain, cattle, fish, wild beasts of every kind, of commerce, the revenues of courts of justice, &c. &c. to be delivered annually to the bishop of the see. By this grant, neither the Tzar nor any layman whatever had a right to interfere in the affairs and government of the Church.

"To their cognisance belonged contracts of marriage, the ceremony of marriage, divorces, settlement of differences betwixt man and wife and relatives; and under this pretence they frequently interfered in matters regarding property also.

"To them was referred every kind of moral transgression, such as marriage within the limits of consanguinity, or between godfathers and godmothers, rape, evil speaking, adultery, non-observance of the fasts, heresy, witchcraft, enchantment, the evil eye, disrespect to the church, sacrilege, illegitimacy, &c. &c.; in all these cases the civil powers were strictly forbidden to interfere."

Again, the different ranks of the clergy, their wives and children, midwives, widows, strangers, paupers, monasteries and monastic baths, hospitals, physicians, and usurers, were all placed under the authority of the Church.

The measures and weights throughout the whole of the Tzar's dominions were under the special super-intendence of the bishops. Under each of these points Vladimir concludes thus:—"Whosoever shall break any of these ordinances, to him it shall be accounted for sin, and he shall not obtain forgiveness of the same from the Lord God, but he shall inherit wrath and woe: and to my own judges and courts, I command, and witness before Christ the Lord and before all his saints, and in the presence of all the people, that ye wrong not the bishops of their holy revenues and taxes and ecclesiastical rights; and that the civil courts shall give nine parts of the revenue to the Tzar, and the tenth part to the holy Church, to our father the bishop, and to all the bishops throughout all the land of Russia, where the sacred thrones of the bishops are erected. And whosoever shall break these laws, which I have ordained according to the regulations of the holy Apostles and Fathers and first orthodox Christian emperors; and whosoever of my children, or my children's children, their princes and nobles, shall contemn or break these laws, or any of the cities or districts, or judges of courts -whosoever shall dare to contemn or infringe these holy statutes and laws, and the revenues of the Church and bishops, or to take them from them, let them be accursed in this world and in the next, by the holy Apostles, and by the seven general Councils of the holy Fathers; for in His holy Gospel the Lord says to all such, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

"Whosoever shall despise or disannul this holy ordinance of the Apostles and Fathers shall bring down the wrath of God upon himself: and wrath pardoneth not, and the curse is in this world and in the next; for in the Gospel it is written, that with the curse all such are sent away from the presence of the Lord God, into eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

Nor was this considered enough by the clergy of those times; for the son of Vladimir, Jaroslaff, not only confirmed, but augmented these privileges, by the following edict:—

"Behold, I the great Prince Jaroslaff Vladimirovitch, according to the grants made by my father to the metropolitan Hilarion of Kief and all Russia, I have ordained, according to the Greek Nomokanon, that these rights (of the Church) are not liable to be judged of by the prince or his nobles; and I have given to the metropolitan, the bishops, and priests and deacons, liberty in all my cities: take not from them, nor from their children, either taxes, or customs, or interest: and he who dares to infringe these ecclesiastical rights, he shall stand with me at the last day before the judgment-seat of Almighty God, and upon him shall rest the curse of the 318 holy fathers of Nice, and of all the saints. Amen."

Thus the Russian clergy were freed from all civil burthens, and richly endowed, by their first Christian rulers. They continued to enjoy these privileges during the whole period of the Tartar yoke, for every new Khan usually confirmed them by a renewal of the ancient acts: and it was customary for the Metropolitan of all Russia, as first dignitary in the Church, to repair to the Tartar horde, and there, by rich presents, secure for himself and his brethren the distinguished advantages granted by Vladimir and his successors.

It is remarkable how much the state of the modern Greeks under the Turkish yoke resembled that of the Russians in the 13th, 14th, and part of the 15th century, under that of the Tartars; and that, though delivered into the hands of their enemies, both were still preserved as distinct nations, and remained stedfast in the Christian profession, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Tartars and Turks to gain them over to Islamism.

Such have been the signal chastisements which the Lord has sent upon the Eastern Church, to deliver over first one half of it, and then the other, to the enemies of the cross—the Russians to suffer bondage for nearly three centuries, under the successors of Jingis Khan; and the Greeks for nearly four hundred years, under the Ottomans! There is something here which resembles, in a remarkable degree, the dealings of God with the ancient Jews; a comparison, which encourages the hope that God will purge the Oriental Communion of its ignorance and superstitious folly, and again cause truth and righteousness to shine forth among her depraved and oppressed members.

That the Russian clergy had very great power and influence in political affairs also, is evident from many parts of Russian history; and also from the fact, that no business of importance was ever decided without their consent, or undertaken till blessed by them. Hence the ancient formula usual in all documents of state: "And according to the benediction of our father the Metropolitan (or afterwards of the Patriarch) of Moscow and all Russia." In accordance with this was an observation which the Metropolitan Leragshiur once made to me, when conversing on the former power of the clergy: "In ancient times, that which the Tzar proposed and the Patriarch blessed was received by the people as the voice of Heaven."

But it was not merely by the Grand-dukes and Tzars that the clergy were enriched and privileged beyond every other class of their subjects: the same causes which operated in the Western Church to exalt and enrich the prelates of the court of Rome—the ignorance and superstition of the people—became a source of immense wealth and power to the Russian clergy also. "For," says the Russian historian Boltin, in endeavouring to account for their extraordinary wealth, "the ecclesiastics had it in their power to assure the people, that what they bestowed upon the monasteries would be returned to them a hundredfold in the world to come; that by taking on the black veil at the hour of death they would cover the sins of an evil life, &c. &c. Not to mention a number of other deceptions, such as visions, apparitions, false miracles, which of themselves were sufficient to transform the treasuries of the opulent into habitations for such as had vowed a total renunciation of all worldly possessions. Aged men and women possessed of great riches and great sins, but poor in judgment and virtuous deeds, in the hope of obtaining eternal life and imperishable treasures, put on, at the approach of death, the black robe, and left their temporal and corruptible possessions to the monasteries; and thus depriving their children and relatives of the inheritance which naturally belonged to them, they enriched those who had vowed to live in poverty, in opposition to every principle of justice and right feeling."

Many of the Russian sovereigns had the same opinions with their subjects, on these points: they not only added to the property of the monks, but actually became monks themselves. Even the most enlightened Tzars, who saw the great evils which arose from this unnatural state of things, felt themselves unable to stem the torrent of clerical influence, or even to attempt it.

The Grand-dukes Joan Vasillivitch III. and IV., having been the means of delivering the nation from the thraldom of the Tartars, attempted to set bounds to the encroachments of the clergy; for, by an edict, they made it unlawful to sell villages and lands to the monasteries and bishops without the special permission of the crown; evidently wishing thereby to preserve the remnant of public property from being added to the overgrown possessions of the clergy.

But the before-mentioned Tzar, in order (as Tatischeff supposes) to get a council of the Russian clergy assembled in Moscow, in 1681, to give their benediction to his sixth marriage, returned all the villages which had been taken from the Church by the statutes of 1557, and granted them still greater facilities in procuring more.

In this manner, notwithstanding the interdict of the Patriarch Philaret, and of Tzar Alexie Michaelovitch, against transferring villages to the monasteries, the custom continued until the monasteries of Russia, at the end of the 15th century, were possessed of about one million of slaves, with extensive landed property on which they resided; not to mention their immense riches in moveables*. In the plenitude of this power and opulence, the Russian monks appeared in the same unfavourable light as many of this class of men in the Latin Church, placed in similar circumstances. In some of the monasteries the monks and nuns lived together; and in Pleskoff their daring immodesty went so far, that, according to Boltin, they bathed together in the same baths.

Among the changes which Peter the Great wrought in Russia was not merely that of correcting the shameful abuses and irregularities among the monks and clergy; he also deprived them of nearly all their rich endowments. Having abolished the patriarchate, and established the Holy Legislative Synod in its stead, on the 18th September 1724, he erected the second department of the synod, under the name of Kammer Kolegia. To this court was committed the management of the villages belonging to the patriarch, bishops, monasteries, and cathedrals. And out of the moneys which remained,

^{*} In 1677, the Tschudoff Monastery possessed 3026 families (dvoroff) of peasants. That of Troitza, near Moscow, 20,131 families, or about 60,000 male peasants alone.—From these, among other examples which could be given, an idea may be formed of the riches of some of the monasteries in Moscow.

after paying the capitation-taxes for the peasants, they appointed the necessary sum for the support of servants, invalids, poor, orphans, and monks, and for divine service; also for the support of the bishops, the monasteries, &c. &c. From that period, to the present time. the Russian clergy have been kept in a degree of poverty, as inconsistent with their important station and office in society, as was their former state of overgrown riches and luxury. Tatischeff the historian says, that Peter the Great established this court for the preservation and right appropriation of the property of the church; because it had not been applied exclusively to the purposes for which it was originally bequeathed, but frequently to enrich the relatives of the higher clergy, and to support a degree of luxury altogether unbecoming the sacred profession.

But it was left for the Empress Catherine II. to annihilate the power of the clergy, and to complete their impoverishment, which had been so effectually begun by Peter; for she appropriated the whole of the immoveable property of the church and clergy to the use of the crown, apportioning stipends in exchange to the monasteries and their rulers. The following statements, made to me in 1832, respecting the stipends, by Seraphim, the present metropolitan of St. Petersburg and Novogorod, will scarcely be credited in these parts of Europe, and especially in England, where such ample provision is made for the clergy. "Our secular clergy," said he, "are so much engaged in the duties of their office, that there remains little or no time for them to study; their income is confined to the free-will offerings of their people; and excepting about twenty-six churches in Moscow and twenty in Petersburg, which afford adequate stipends, the whole body of the Russian secular priesthood have but a scanty subsistence for their wives and children: on this account, many of the village clergy cultivate their fields with their own hands, and have no time to think of improving their minds by study." The duties of the secular priesthood in Russia are very laborious: the service in the church, which must be performed three times a day, and which, from its excessive length, is evidently of monastic origin, together with the numerous ceremonies at baptism, marriage, burial of the dead, visiting of the sick, &c., occupy most of the priest's time, when his parish is large, and leave him but little leisure for study. To this cause I am disposed to attribute, in part, that want of cordial interest in the cause of Religion which characterizes so many of them. Their being made priests too, in thousands of instances. contrary to their choice, must also produce this effect.

"As to the regular clergy," continued Seraphim, "they are few in number, in proportion to the labour that devolves upon them, of teaching and superintending the spiritual schools, overseeing the monasteries, and filling the office of bishop." He further assured me, on this occasion, that an archimandrite (the rank next to a bishop), even of monasteries of the first class, had not above 1000 roubles annually (40l.), regular income. The number of the clergy of all ranks is about 215,000; and the sum allowed for their support by Government is only about two millions of roubles, or 80,000l.; hence they are mostly dependent on the free-will offerings of their people for support; viz. perquisites for baptisms, marriages, funerals, &c.

Seraphim is about seventy years of age; and a man of sound judgment, according to the extent of his knowledge. He is simple in his habits, natural in his manners, and generally speaks freely what he thinks. The Greek.

Latin, French, and Slavonian languages are the mediums through which he has gained his knowledge. His debilitated state of health often unfits him for the numerous public duties of his station: his vicar, therefore, frequently officiates in his stead. Such is the present senior metropolitan of the Russian Church, whose whole revenue does not amount to 600*l*. per annum;—a small sum indeed, to keep up his coach and six, and domestic establishment!

To make the reader somewhat more acquainted with the principles of Seraphim, I subjoin his address at the Anniversary of the Moscow Bible Society, on the 18th March 1820:—

"Of all the blessings which the mercy of God has bestowed upon us, there is none greater and more complete than his holy word. I shall not attempt to describe all the advantages which flow from it, for they are more than can be numbered or expressed: suffice it for me, with the Apostle Paul, to declare, that it is the power of God unto salvation. But this Divine word, so necessary to the children of men for their happiness. remained confined to the narrow precincts of Judæa, until the hypostatic Word of the Father, Christ the Lord, having taken our nature upon himself, had finished the great work of our redemption; and until God the Father, having raised him from the dead, had said unto him-'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee: ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.' Then it was, that Jesus, having conquered sin, and death, and hell, became 'King over all the earth,' and sent his disciples to preach unto every creature the word of truth—the living and lifegiving word which he received from the Father; and without deeming it needful to array them with the symbols of any other power than that of the Holy Spirit. This Holy Spirit spake with their lips; and their words became like as a fire, and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces. This same Holy Spirit wrought in them, and by their hands, mighty signs and wonders, captivating the minds and hearts of men to the obedience of the faith which they preached, so that nothing could withstand them. They put to shame the imaginary wisdom of philosophers, they laid open the deception and flattery of priests, they overawed and astonished tyrants; and, having broken down their idols, overturned their altars, and demolished their unclean temples. they erected on their ruins the Cross of Christ, before whom all nations shall bow. And, though they themselves ultimately became victims of their ardent zeal for God, and their heads fell beneath the sword of the executioner, yet their blood became a seal to the truth, and the seed of believers.

"At last, the voice of the Apostles ceased to be heard—those trumpets of the Holy Ghost sound no more—true: but the Holy Catholic Church has preserved unto us the voices of the Prophets, and the sounds of the Apostles; has preserved the Divine word spoken by them, perfect and unadulterated, notwithstanding the efforts of their enemies, who strove to corrupt it, in order to support their heresies; has preserved it, in defiance of the power of tyrants, who sought to destroy it by fire, thinking thereby to consume the faith itself. Let us render, my brethren, thanksgivings, from the depths of our souls, to an all-gracious Providence for preserving unto us these invaluable treasures of truth! And being in the possession of this treasure, let us watch over it, as over the apple of our eye. O that the truth which is revealed by the Holy Spirit, in the sacred volume, may become the life of our life, and the light and food of our souls! and that the word of truth, the word of God, may be the only rule of our lives! But woe, woe unto those who disregard this truth of God, and unto such as hold it in unrighteous-Because of disrespect to His holy word, the Lord cut off the most ancient Church in the world, the Jewish Church: on account of this disrespect and neglect, the Lord removed the candlesticks out of their places in many of the Churches of Asia and Africa, which once shone in the beauty of holiness, like the stars in the firmament: others of them he punished with spiritual famine, so that the prophecy of Amos was accomplished upon them: 'They shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east; they shall run to and fro, to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it.' O what a fearful punishment was this! For where the word of the Lord is not found, there the Lord himself is absent. His gracious influences are unknown, and there remains nothing but lies, deceptions, fables, spiritual death, and the dominion of the prince of darkness!

In proportion, then, as we esteem the word of God to be holy, and indispensable for ourselves, the sacred obligation rests upon us, not merely to know it, and zealously to strive to obey it, but also to endeavour by every possible means to put it into the hands of others, that they also may learn to know and obey it. We are bound not only to nourish our own souls with this celestial bread, but likewise to impart it to such as are hungering after it; not merely to quench the thirst of our own souls with this living water, which floweth into everlasting life, but to give it to others, that they likewise may quench their thirst. Love to God our Saviour demands this from us: to Him nothing can be more acceptable than that we care for the good of those for whom he shed his precious blood. Love to our neighbour demands this from us; for, in bestowing upon him the word of God, we afford him the most infallible means for obtaining the salvation of his soul.

"It is with infinite regret, however, that we must confess that this highly important and sacred duty has been seldom rightly understood and felt by us, in its full extent: the sacred writings, in time past, have been left in the hands of the clergy, as a matter with which they only had any concern; while among the other classes of society but very few either possessed or read them.

"Out of this state of things a mighty evil arose ignorance of the Law of God; ignorance of that, which is the only effectual barrier to the corrupt passions of men. No sooner was this thrown aside, than men became ungovernable. In every direction the passions of men have raged with fury, filling cities and peaceful villages with falsehood, deceit, oppression, bribery, corruption, and every species of wickedness. But when this iniquity began to abound, and to threaten the existence of all social order and happiness, a gracious God was pleased to raise up the Bible Society, whose sole object is, the increase and circulation of the Books of Holy Writ, with a view to re-establish and extend the pure knowledge of the holy Law of God, which is the only right guide of our actions: by this distinguished intervention of Providence, God has placed a strong barrier to this evil, and laid a stable foundation for the building up of the true faith and genuine piety, even unto the ends of the earth.

"Nor is this mere conjecture—it is truth, supported by numerous present events; for the conductors of the benevolent Bible Society, who, at its commencement, undertook the circulation of the sacred writings, first among their fellow-countrymen, were soon after excited by the spirit of faith to extend their labours to the whole of mankind. And with what diligence and zeal did they begin the truly grand undertaking! Some of their members, leaving their place of nativity, their wives, children, and friends, have crossed distant seas and rivers; others have traversed burning sands and deepening snows; have even settled among uncivilized and half-savage tribes, for the express purpose of learning their language, and translating the Holy Scriptures into them, in order to bestow this precious light and treasure upon them.

"Verily it seems to me, that the consummating vision of the beloved Disciple of Christ is now realizing: 'And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying, with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to Him.' For, in the present day, the Bible Societies are actually promulgating the Gospel of God in almost every nation, in the languages which they understand; and the inhabitants, especially the heathens, receive it with joy and veneration, as a gift sent down Soon shall those heathen lands, to them from heaven. which hitherto have been unfruitful deserts, blossom as the rose! soon, very soon, shall holy Churches be established, and their light begin to shine before the throne of God, where the lights of former Churches have been extinguished! O what a sublime spectacle when the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God; and when, from the east to the west, songs of praise shall be heard in honour of the Conqueror, in honour of the Lamb that has redeemed us unto God by His blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation!

- "Brethren! though we are not likely to live till this desirable period, yet we can hasten its approach by uniting with the Bible Society, and diligently scattering abroad the seed of the Divine word; in full confidence that the Lord will not leave it to perish, when it falls on good ground, but will cause it to grow, through the gracious influences of His Spirit.
- "O eternal and hypostatic Word of the Father, rend from our hearts the murdering word of the evil one, and the captivating word of this world! and then shall Thy sacred word become vivifying and effectual, unto our regeneration, sanctification, and salvation. Amen!"

The Emperor Paul, in 1797, renewed the usage, introduced by Peter the Great, of conferring on the clergy the same chivalric marks of distinction as are bestowed upon the military and civil servants of the crown. has been severely censured for this step: in which, however, he only followed the example set him by his illustrious predecessor, who had decorated with the insignia of the order of St. Andrew, Theodosius, archbishop of Novogorod. These marks of distinction, which are no less anxiously coveted among all ranks of the clergy in the present day than by warriors and statesmen, have become a powerful instrument in the hands of the crown, for securing their influence in favour of the measures of Government. A bishop is little thought of now, unless decorated with the star and ribbon of some order of knighthood, which are worn by him, when he officiates, above his pontifical robes, and add not a little to his importance in the eyes of the multitude.

The clergy of the present day are exempt from all taxes, from providing recruits, quartering soldiers, and from every kind of civil burthen. They are also exempt from corporal punishment; and are allowed to purchase lands, but not slaves.

The Russian clergy, taken as a body, are tolerant in their principles towards other confessions of faith, especially towards Protestants. In my intercourse with the Greek patriarchs and prelates, the Russian metropolitans, bishops, and archimandrites, I have almost uniformly been treated with an open, fraternal cordiality. Very different has been my experience in my intercourse with the Roman-Catholic legates, archbishops, bishops, canons, and clergy: there seemed always a kind of shyness and distrust expressed in their features, while their manner was never easy and ingenuous. To what. I have sometimes asked myself, can this marked difference of character in the clergy of the Eastern and Western Churches be attributed?—principally. I believe, to two causes. First, The Greek Church has never been a persecuting community, and its dogmas are nearer to the principles of the Reformation than to those of the Western Church. Secondly, That preposterous principle of the Church of Rome, which condemns to everlasting woe all who are without the pale of her communion, a principle as much abhorred by the Greek as by the Protestant clergy, places an insurmountable obstacle in the way of Christian intercourse between the votaries of Rome, and the adherents of Protestantism. Before ever the Roman Catholic can have Christian feeling towards his Protestant fellow-Christian, this principle must be given up.

theless, no member of the Greek Church is permitted to join any other Christian communion, so that in this respect there is no liberty of conscience; and when a marriage takes place between one of its members and a person of another profession, the children must all be baptized into the dominant faith. As the regular clergy of Russia have all the spiritual schools and seminaries in their hands, together with the government of the Church, their time is occupied in active duties. After they have finished their own studies, they spend a great part of their lives as teachers in the seminaries, and then as egoumens and archimandrites over the monasteries, where they not unfrequently continue the same duties of teachers until they become bishops: and as bishops, such is the extent of their dioceses, and the numbers of the secular clergy under them, that though they have the assistance of a Consistory, yet their time and talents are fully occupied until old age: so that the Russian clergy of all ranks lead laborious lives, if they conscientiously apply to the duties of their station. The bishops officiate and preach in the cathedrals on all the principal festivals, and some of them on other days also: and when they do not, their place is taken by the archimandrite or other subordinate ecclesiastic. Their sermons are, in general, simple homiletical compositions, such as the bearded boors before them, in their sheep-skin coats and sandals made of the rind of the linden-tree, can well understand. The published discourses of others display specimens of energetic and pathetic writing, not unworthy of men who are proud of having learnt eloquence in the school of Chrysostom*. I have found among them persons of genuine piety, learning, and benevolence:

abstemious in their habits, and exemplary in their lives; distinguished for candour, modesty, and a truly primitive simplicity of manners. As to the secular or parochial clergy, they form a kind of distinct tribe, like that of the Levites of old; because none but the sons of the clergy are educated for the church; nor is there one instance in a thousand of any person entering the sacred profession from the other classes of society. The regular clergy, on the contrary, though often sons of priests, not unfrequently receive additions to their numbers from among the nobles and other classes; and all the higher stations in the church are still filled up from their ranks.

In the family circles of the secular clergy we observe a degree of culture and good manners peculiar to themselves; and notwithstanding that the husband is obliged to conform to the dress of his order*, the wife and daughters, especially among the town clergy, are fond of imitating European fashions. Moreover, most of the female branches of their families are able to read, though schools for the daughters of Russia are, alas! still very rare. Their marriages being nearly confined within the circle of their own profession, is another cause of the peculiarity observable in their station and manners. Occasionally, however, the sons of the clergy are even permitted to enter the civil service of their country; and in past ages, and especially in the present, such have not unfrequently been distinguished for a sound education, united to superior abilities. Some of the most eminent Russian statesmen, poets, historians, mathematicians, and artists, have been sons of the clergy, educated in the spiritual schools; which, even to the present day, seem to be the most productive seminaries for talent and learning in the empire: and the late re-organization of these schools, under the superintendence of Philaret, by which the course of studies is extended to almost every department of philological, philosophical, and theological learning, bids fair to preserve their pre-eminence.

The spiritual schools, as they are called, belong to the most ancient institutions for learning in Russia; for during the Tartar yoke and the dark ages, any degree of literary knowledge which existed among the Russians was confined, as in other countries of Europe, solely to the clergy; hence, till the establishment of the public schools in the beginning of the last century, these were the only seminaries of instruction in the country. In the earliest of the spiritual schools that were founded, at the introduction of Christianity, the Greek and Slavonian languages, and the writings of the Greek Fathers, were the principal subjects of study; but on the founding of an Academy at Kief, after the manner of the Polish Schools, Latin became the classical language, and the scholars were taught Grammar, Rhetoric, Philosophy, and Divinity. The same course of instruction was also adopted in the Spiritual Academy of Moscow, and continued till the end of the sixteenth century. of these schools was much improved by Peter I., and a degree of learning introduced into them unknown in the preceding ages. His successors also have paid considerable attention to the education of the priesthood an object of the very first importance for promoting the civilization and happiness of their subjects; and hence, since his time, various improvements have been made in these seminaries. Thus, in 1788, the two seminaries of Novogorod and Alexandroff were united, and students of talent were ordered to be sent hither from the other clerical schools, to be prepared for the office of teachers. In 1797, the spiritual seminaries of Alexandroff and Kazan were denominated Academies; and, together with the former two of Kief and Moscow, were furnished with teachers answerable to their designation, as the first spiritual schools of the empire. The following year the same course of liberal education which had been adopted in the Academy of Alexandroff was introduced into the other three academies, and into all the seminaries. It was also ordered, that these four academies should be particularly appropriated for training up the most hopeful young men to the office of teachers in the spiritual schools. The course of instruction in these schools was again extended; and, by a ukaz in 1802, a medical class was ordered to be instituted at each of the academies and diocesan seminaries of the clergy. latter arrangement, however, was not of long continuence, and was afterwards abolished. In the four academies, and in some of the seminaries, the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, and German languages are taught, together with Natural and Moral Philosophy, Mathematics, History, Rhetoric, Divinity, &c. &c.

Of these schools, four are academies, as above specified; and thirty-six are seminaries, one in every diocese, under the special superintendency of the bisbop. There are also a number of district and parochial schools for the children of the clergy, in which they are prepared for the above seminaries: these are specified in the metropolitan's letter, already given. The children are usually sent to them when about eight or ten years of age. They begin with the Latin and Slavonic tongues; and according to their progress in these, are advanced into the higher classes. The students in the academies and seminaries are taught by means of public lectures, delivered by the preceptors, now styled Professors. merly these teachers were all monks and priests; but this is not now required; so that many of the professors and teachers are laymen. The four academies confer the degrees of M.A. and D.D. The district schools for elementary instruction in all the dioceses amount to 360, and the parochial to 1080; and the number of scholars in these four degrees of spiritual schools, established exclusively for the sons of the clergy, is upwards of 30.000.

The Professors who issued from the Nevskoy academy, when it was under Philaret, are fond of biblical criticism, and are well acquainted with the best authors of that class. I have often warned them against the works of the modern German Neologists, with which some are already acquainted. What a pity would it be to see those seminaries, which have to provide pastors and deacons for upwards of 26,000 churches—and which are now, we trust, shaking off the ignorance and superstitions which have enveloped them for so many ages—falling into the opposite extreme of rationalism and infidelity!

I here visited, at the invitation of Moses the Rector, the academy founded by Peter Mogila, metropolitan of Kief, in 1631: it is known under the name of Academia Orthodoxa Kiova-Mohilæna. It is situated in the Podol, a part of the city upon the low ground on the side of the river: it is a very large edifice, built of brick, and plastered; and was, when I visited it, undergoing extensive repairs. The rooms for the students, and the class rooms, are large and commodious. The chapel is small, but neat. In the library they have a good collection of the writings of the Greek Fathers, but comparatively few works on modern science, literature, or divinity. Moses pointed out to me the Charters of the Tzars, containing the immunities granted to the institution; but none of them are very ancient.

The number of students was about fifty. These, together with those of the three other academies of Petersburg, Moscow, and Kazan, are prepared for becoming professors in the diocesan seminaries; one of which, as we have elsewhere stated, is usually attached to every bishopric. 'The spiritual seminary of Kief has about 300 students. The metropolitan is at the head of both these institutions for training young men for the I took tea with Moses and two of the professors of the academy, and was much pleased with their enlightened conversation. We discoursed for upwards of two hours on the essential doctrines of Christianity: and I found that their studies, under Philaret in the Nevskov Academy of St. Petersburg, had been profound and liberal, tracing effects to their causes, and making the word of God the only arbiter in matters of faith.

All the public schools of every description, yet established for the laity throughout the empire, are under the inspection of the six universities of Moscow, Petersburg, Dorpot, Vilna, Kazan, and Harkoff. When, however, we turn from the promising aspect of instruction and learning that is seen among the Russian clergy, to take a view of the small provision hitherto made for the instruction of the other classes of the inhabitants, the contrast is so striking, that the disproportion will hardly be credited: yet every year is gradually adding to the number both of schools and scholars, and the Government seems anxious to extend the blessings of education, especially to the middle ranks.

Each of the universities has the provincial gymnasiums, and the district and other smaller schools, under its super-intendence: About a hundred students at each university are supported by the crown: they are prepared for becoming professors and teachers in the gymnasiums, in which also a certain number of the scholars are educated at the cost of the Government. From these seminaries are obtained young men to fill the various laborious offices under Government, and also the different departments of medicine. The number of seminaries and inferior schools under the seven universities, at the present day, is probably not more than 2500, in which there may be about 125,000 scholars.

Few of the children of the nobles attend these schools: they are generally educated at home, by foreigners; or in private boarding-schools, also kept by foreigners. Few of them choose the study of letters: hence a fashionable education suits their taste better than a classical one. The civil and military services are those which they invariably prosecute; and the learned professions, like the church, are supplied principally from the lower orders of the people. Nevertheless, these universities are placed under a Curator, who is generally a nobleman by birth; and the Presidencies of the academies of arts and sciences, and of benevolent and other institutions, are also occupied by men of rank and fortune. The professors and teachers of the universities and seminaries also obtain rank, and rise according to merit or seniority; and when no longer fit for active service, they receive a small pension. even their regular salaries are altogether inadequate to support their rank and station in society. A professor has only about 801, per annum, and his assistant 321.; a professor of languages 241.; and each of the students supported by the crown about 8l. per annum. Under the universities there are also a few establishments for the education of the sons of the nobility. Those of Moscow and Tzarskoi-Selo are the most distinguished. In the former, the number of boarders is about 300, for whom the parents pay; and the rest attend only as day-scholars, but are obliged to dine at the table of the institution. The first class pay 321. per annum: and the second class 24l.

The first school ever established in the country was founded here, by Vladimir the Great; and was put under the care of the metropolitan. The directions given by the latter to the masters are still preserved, of which the following is not an unfavourable specimen:—

"Instruct the children," said the metropolitan, "in truth and virtue, in book science, good manners, and charity; in the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom; and in purity and humility. Instruct them not with anger and severity, but with joy and trembling, and affectionate treatment—with sweet precepts and gentle consolation, that they may neither become weary nor weak. Teach them diligently and frequently; and give them tasks according to their powers, so that they may not faint and droop: but above all things, instruct them assiduously out of the Law of the Lord, for the advantage of both soul and body; and restrain them from foolish and improper language."

In the year 1031, the Grand-duke, Jaroslaff I., son of Vladimir, following the example of his father, established a school at Novogorod for the education of 300 sons of the clergy and nobles; for whom also he ordered several works to be translated from the Greek into the Slavonian. Of some of these translations, the originals are still preserved here, in the Church of St. Sophia.

But from this period, viz. 1017, till the time of Peter the Great, education seems to have made no progress whatever, but to have remained, where it began, among the clergy and a few of the nobles;—and how very limited still is the knowledge of letters in this country! If we except the clergy, the nobility, and the two first guilds of the merchants, not one in 500 of all the rest of the population of native Russians can yet read.

We left Kief at nine in the morning of the 28th of December, and reached Brovari about midday. The frost was most intense, being more than twenty degrees of Reaumur, and we had great difficulty in preserving the extremities and the face from becoming frost-bitten. In the evening we arrived at the prosperous little town of Nejin, situated on the right bank of the Oster. This is one of the finest towns in Little Russia, containing about 10,000 inhabitants. It has a fortress, and is encompassed with an earthen rampart. Many of the houses are of brick, and well built. Here are fifteen churches, and two monasteries. The population is composed of Greeks, Armenians, Cossacks, and Russians:

the two former carry on a considerable commerce with Turkey and Poland. They have also three fairs in the year, which attract strangers from a distance, and give scope to the enterprising spirit of the inhabitants. Among the Greek merchants of Nejin, the family of Zosima are distinguished, not merely for their opulence, but for their public spirit and extraordinary exertions. during the last forty years, to revive learning among their countrymen in Greece. Many years before the Greek Revolution, they established schools in different parts of Greece, and printed large editions of the principal Greek classics for these schools and for the nation at large: they also published, in connexion with the Moscow Bible Society, but at their own sole expense, 3000 copies, in quarto, of the Septuagint, with the Greek New Testament annexed, for distribution in different parts of the Levant. Their sacrifices in money and otherwise. in aid of the independence of Greece, have also been proportionally great. One cannot sufficiently admire the high patriotic character of these three brethren (with one of whom, who resides in Moscow, I have long been acquainted), who, though not learned men themselves, have taken so distinguished a part in the revival of liberty and learning among the Greeks.

After stopping a short time at Nejin, we continued our course through the night, at a great rate, over boundless plains of snow and ice: but at the village of Komorofka, the first station from Nejin, we had nearly met with a serious accident. The frost was excessive, and the snow our only luminary, as the moon was far gone in the wane. The postillion had just yoked abreast three fine spirited horses to my sledge, and was muffling himself up in his furs to take his seat in the front, when the horses took fright, and darted off furiously through the village. We had nothing to expect but that the sledge would be dashed to pieces, and the baggage and other articles scattered in the snow, there probably to remain till the returning Spring should bring them to light. Several of the postillions set out on horseback in search, but returned without discovering any traces of them. Other persons were despatched in pursuit: at last, by the tinkling of the bell attached to the neck of the middle horse, they were discovered half buried in a snow-wreath, from which they could not extricate themselves, not above a hundred yards from the outer fences. On clearing the village, they had turned off into the fields, and soon plunged into this avalanche, from which they had struggled in vain to get They had sufficient time to cool themselves in this snow-bath, before they were discovered: every thing, however, was safe, and nothing broken.-We continued our course through the night, skimming along at a swift rate, and reached Baturin to breakfast.

This beautifully-situated and well-built little town stands on the stream Segma, and is named after its founder, Etienne Batori, king of Poland: it was formerly the residence of the Hetman of the Ukraine. In 1708, it was the rendezvous of the famous rebel Mazepa, by whose overthrow it suffered greatly, until, with the surrounding villages, containing with the town a population of 20,000 souls, it was given by the Empress Elizabeth to the last Hetman of the Ukraine, Count Cyril Razumofsky, who rebuilt it, and in whose family it still continues.

Baturin has four parochial churches and a monastery: it carries on a considerable trade.

We prosecuted our route through the government of Tschernigeff, and entered that of Orel at Tolstodubova. We reached Sevsk to dinner. Our sufferings, from cold in the night, were intense: the mercury was as low as 24 degrees.

Sevsk is a district town on the right bank of the Seve. The bishop of Orel usually resides here. It has ten churches, and about 6000 inhabitants, most of them employed in agriculture. We continued our course through the night; and after having performed a most fatiguing journey of four days and three nights from Kief, we arrived in the provincial town of Orel about noon the next day.

The appearance of the country from Odessa to Nicholaief is flat and woodless. Near Elizabetgrad several ravines produce some little variety on the surface, but few trees of any kind are to be seen; and this bald uninteresting scene continues as far as Kief, though with rather more undulations on the face of the country as we approach the banks of the Dnieper. about Kief may be styled hills; and are formed by the torrents that flow into the above-mentioned river. creating, in their course, a number of ravines. crossing the Dnieper at Kief, the country continues level the whole way to Orel, except here and there a few gently-rising slopes; but there is extremely little wood, though the scene is not quite so bare as that south of the Dnieper. Here is little variety of prospect, therefore, to amuse the traveller, excepting the common appearances of a rigorous Russian winter—the blue expanse of heaven above, with the boundless snow-clad earth beneath, and the pale powerless lunar-like rays of the sun shed over it; spotted with hamlets and villages, often at many miles distance from each other, and nearly concealed from view by Winter's universal robe: now and then a chain of sledges traverses the scene, and at twilight seems to be moving in the air, so singularly does the united line of snow and sky deceive the eye of the beholder; or perhaps the sound of a fellow-traveller's bell is heard tinkling, as he draws near. This precaution is adopted to prevent accidents in the night, as the movement of the sledge upon the snow, like that of a ship on the sea, gives no intimation of its approach. Such is the monotonous scenery which presents itself to the traveller in Russia, during winter. But the intensity of the cold, and its invigorating effects on animal life, seem to make every living creature move with greater celerity; and, in general, I have observed the Russians give greater demonstrations of joy at the commencement of winter than at the opening of spring.

After breakfast, I took a sledge and drove to the monastery, where I was very kindly welcomed by Jon, bishop of Orel. He seemed to be about fifty-five years of age: he conversed with me for some time on the affairs of the Orel Society; and, as he was just preparing to go and officiate in the cathedral, we agreed to meet at the house of the Procurator of the Government, Mr. Abaza, at dinner.

I next waited upon General Korff, one of the Vice-Presidents, who was remarkably civil, and, at my request, sent a soldier with me to the ostrog or prison, to beg the captain on guard to shew me that institution. It is a square fortress-looking place, flanked with towers; but, internally, the buildings are miserable decayed wooden huts. In the first, which consists of two apartments, we found eighteen sick: it is styled the Hospital. How wretched seemed to be the condition of these poor sick criminals! The second hut was divided into three rooms; one containing forty prisoners, another fifty-two, and a third with thirty-six—men convicted of various crimes, some of them of the deepest dye. The floor was damp earth, and the walls and windows were dripping from the effect of the frost and the internal warmth of the stove; but so little room was there, that, as they informed us, some were forced to lie under the benches, on the ground, as the benches would not contain them all.

In the second division of the fortress, separated from the first by a high brick wall, we found, in the first hut, forty-eight prisoners, lodged in a crowded dirty wet hole, and in the second room twenty-one females, in the most pitiable circumstances imaginable; the floors very wet, and the walls and ceiling running with water, from the severity of the cold without and the heat of the atmosphere within! And what deepened the shades of this picture of human wretchedness was, that four of these females were seated upon the flat top of the stove, playing at cards. In a third room of this hut were twentyseven prisoners; and in a fourth, forty-five, belonging to the military, all in similar circumstances of misery, for want of proper lodging. In two of the eight places of confinement they had copies of the Scriptures; but in the rest there were none. I promised that they should be supplied.—They are allowed seven kopicks a day for food.

Among the prisoners, my attention was particularly arrested by a man of middle age, belonging to the sect of Scoptzi or Eunuchs. This most extraordinary sect, in imitation of Origen, adopt the literal meaning of Matthew xix. 12. It will hardly be believed that such a sect could ever become numerous; yet, in Petersburg alone, their Society contains upwards of two hundred members. They are chiefly money-changers and jewellers, and are rich. They reside in the quarter of the city called Peski; and have their own private meetings, and worship, which consists of singing, prayer, and exposition of the Scriptures. They are said to be sound in essential points of doctrine, and versed in the Scriptures, and they partake of the ordinances in the National Church: but they are excessively reserved; and hence it is most difficult to gain correct information concerning their opinions and practices. These few particulars respecting them I received principally from a friend, the late Senator Hablitz, who lived for many years next door to some of them. In general, it is easy to distinguish them from other men: they become sallow and sicklylooking, their beards and hair begin to fall off and look parched, and in all respects they resemble a drooping, withering plant. And such also was the appearance of the poor infatuated Scopetz whom I saw in the prison of Orel.

I remember that, a short time before I left Petersburg in 1823, the metropolitan, Seraphim, informed me, that in one of the regiments which had received copies of the Russ Testament, seventeen of the soldiers had mutilated themselves, alleging, as the reason, Matt. xix. 12; and that the General, in his report to the Emperor on the case, had proposed to take all the copies out of their hands. His Majesty had referred the matter to the metropolitan: and his Eminence stated to me, that much as he lamented what had taken place from the ignorance of the men, and the leaven, probably, of the sect of Scoptzi, or from the desire of the soldiers to get freed from the service by maining themselves (a practice not uncommon among them), yet he could on no account agree with the proposal of the General. they have misunderstood the mind of the Saviour," said he, "they now need the Testament more than ever, to bring them to a better understanding: and, in general, our duty is to do what is right, leaving consequences to God; for these we are not answerable."

On leaving the ostrog, I drove to the Procurator's, where I found the bishop, three archimandrites, and a number of the nobility, already assembled to celebrate New-Year's-day, and the Name's-day of a member of the family; to which feast I also was kindly invited. A plentiful repast was served up, in the European style, with good wines; and we had much agreeable conversation, in which the operations of the Bible Society formed a prominent subject.

The two great domestic festivals among the Russians are the name's-day and birth-day. These are scrupulously observed by all classes, and never fail to bring together the relatives and friends of the family to partake of the feast, which is the necessary attendant on such an occasion. Thus every individual in a family, young and old, has his two days in the year, which bring a festivity along with them into the domestic circle. the two fêtes, the name's-day, or anniversary of the saint after whom the person is named, is considered the most important. On both occasions, it is the custom to make presents to the individual, to drink his health at table, to shew him marked attention, and to use every possible means of gratifying him. Among the Russian merchants in the interior, it is still common, before the commencement of the feast, in the presence of the guests, to take a large pie made of buck-wheat and eggs, and break it in pieces over the head of the imieninnik; and if its contents remain richly upon his head and shoulders, this is taken as a sign that he is to be blessed with health and plenty during the succeeding year.

On these occasions, even the Tzars and Patriarchs of former times used to present each other with large patties; for it is recorded that, in 1671, Tzar Alexie Michaelovitch went to the Patriarch on his name's-day, to congratulate him, and presented him with a large pie; which example was also followed by the Boiars who attended him.

The servants and slaves, on the morning of their own name's-day or birth-day, are accustomed to approach their master, in their best attire, and offer him a present of a pie, a dozen of apples, or some dried fruits, with the view of receiving in return a handsome present in money, with which to treat their friends and companions. These claims are regularly preferred by each domestic, in the houses not only of the Russians, but of foreigners also, and are universally and punctually complied with: the return to the female servants is made, if not in money, in some article of dress, with which they are equally pleased.

Orel is an extensive town, built along the hilly banks of the Oka and Orlik. It has about 22,000 inhabitants, almost all Russians. Here are several fine rows of brick houses; but the rest are of wood. In front of one of the best rows, where the governor and the nobles reside, a fine promenade has been lately formed. They count eighteen churches, and two monasteries. The principal commerce of the inhabitants is in hemp and grain; the latter for the supply of Moscow, the former for exportation.

I passed the evening with the bishop and archimandrites, in the monastery. His Eminence informed me that the Orel Bible Society had collected 9611 roubles, and brought into circulation 1000 copies of the sacred writings; that his diocese consisted of 860 churches, of which not 100 had Bibles, and that even the priests belonging to them are still, for the most part, without the Bible. When I was about to take leave, one of the archiman-drites, with a cordial embrace and shake of the hand, gave me a sealed paper, which he requested me to take with me. On returning to the inn, I observed that the letter was addressed to myself; and, on opening it, what was my surprise, at finding that it contained two Bankbills of 25 roubles each, with these words, "To the zealous promulgator of the word of God—Be pleased to accept of these two mites (2l.), in aid of your travelling expenses, from your sincere brother Peter, archimandrite of the monastery of St. Nicholas"! This I considered a pleasing demonstration of a heart warmed with love to the Bible cause, of which he had heard so much during the day.—They promised me, at parting, to furnish the prisons and hospitals with the Scriptures.

Left Orel, and took the track for Tula. The frost was more than 27 degrees. Many of the peasantry, coming to market, had their cheeks and noses frost-bitten. every part of the country from Kief, as we came along, we heard great lamentations over the loss of lives on the 16th of last month; when great numbers had perished in the storm, from wind, cold, and drifting snow. In one village they had lost four lives; in another, six; inanother, ten; and so on. Almost every town and village we passed had its melancholy tale of woe respecting that day, on which so many of their sires and sons were buried beneath the shapeless drift, and the deadly frost suddenly shut up the springs of life. In the district of Sevsk alone they reckoned upwards of one hundred who had perished on that day. As the corpses are discovered, they are brought to the district towns, whither the friendless, the fatherless, and the widow, repair, to claim the stiffened remains of their nearest and dearest relatives, and to attend their funeral obsequies;—one solemn ceremony for all!

In the afternoon we arrived at the town of Metzensk. which seems well built, and is beautified with several fine churches. Indeed no country in Europe possesses such a number of fine churches as Russia! The meanest village is generally furnished with a magnificent temple. with gilt domes and spires, which would grace any city. These edifices are nearly all in the Grecian style of architecture, substantially built of brick, plastered and painted with much taste, and form a striking contrast to the humble wooden huts or izbas of the people en-Throughout the empire there are not circling them. fewer than 483 cathedrals, and 26,598 churches. Formerly many of them were of wood; but these are gradually being replaced by brick edifices, having the roofs covered with sheet-iron, and painted green; and most of them are built in the form of a cross.

Every church is divided into three parts: first, the sanctum sanctorum, called the altar, into which females are not allowed to enter. This is separated from the body of the church by the εἰκονόστασις, ikonostas, or screen. In the midst of this holy place stands the holy table, upon which are always laid a golden or silver cross or crucifix, and a richly ornamented copy of the Gospels or a Bible. This part of the church is at the east end; so the congregation always worship with their faces towards the rising sun.

On the ikonostas are hung the sacred pictures of the Saviour and the Virgin, with the apostles and saints, on the side next the body of the church. In the midst of this screen are the $9i\rho\alpha$ $\dot{\alpha}\gamma\dot{\alpha}$, or "holy doors," which are opened at different times during the service. Upon a platform before the ikonostasis, raised several steps, the readers and singers stand, behind a low railing, which separates them from the congregation; and in the middle, before the holy doors, the priests and deacons perform most of the services, and deliver their discourses to the people.

The second compartment of the church is the nave, which may properly be styled the inner court, where the congregation stand and worship; for there are no seats in the Russian churches, neither do the congregation make any use of books during the service.

The third division is the trapeza, which is the west end of the building, and may be denominated the outer court. This is usually as large as the inner court; and on Sundays and holidays both divisions are usually well filled. The inner walls and domes of the churches are covered with Scriptural paintings, representing the most interesting scenes of our Saviour's life. The ikonostasis is always richly ornamented and gilded; and the sacred pictures are covered, except the face and hands, with plates of gold or silver, studded with pearls and other gems.

Adjoining to each church, or near it, there is always a kolokolnia or belfry, commonly of great height, and provided with large bells, which are tolled several times during every service, and on holidays kept ringing the whole day. The Russians are passionately fond of the sound of bells, and in no country in Europe are larger and finer sounding ones to be found: every church has in its steeple four or five, of different sizes; and in many this number is doubled and even tripled.

We continued our course from Metzensk, intending to travel all night, having no other light than the snow and the spangled vault of heaven. It is wonderful to observe with what skill the horses keep upon the beaten track, during the night, in these boundless plains of snow, even where there is not, for many miles together, a single bush or object of any kind to direct their course.— We reached the village of Skaratova about midnight. A few versts before we came to it, the postillion pointed out the place where two merchants had been attacked in the night of the 15th of last month, by four robbers, who took from them 18,000 roubles and all their clothes, after wounding and treating them most cruelly.

The horses we got at Skaratova, having been too much driven the preceding day, became quite unable to proceed. Afraid of being obliged to stop in the middle of the stage, at a distance from any dwelling, I resolved on returning to the last village we had passed, and remaining till morning. A peasant received us into his hut. Both apartments of it were full of travelling peasantry, sleeping on straw, in rows, upon the floor. I also had no alternative but to lie down on a narrow bench at the side of the wall, where I slept about two hours in my cloak, notwithstanding the heat and confined air of the apartment.

Not being able to proceed with the jaded post-horses, I engaged three from our landlord, to carry us to Sergeifskoy, the next post station, a distance of seventeen versts, where we arrived to breakfast. The remainder of our journey to Tula was extremely dangerous, on account of the winds and drifting snows. We were compelled to remain four hours at the village of Solova, until the weather should become more moderate, as the postmaster judged it hazardous to proceed. At last we ventured out again; and, during the last two stages to Tula, had several narrow escapes from being buried in the drifts. When the horses were unable to drag us through the wreaths, and stood still but for a few minutes, the winds sifted the snow around us so quickly, that in a very short time, had we been unable to get on, we must have found our graves in it, like the thousands who perished in similar circumstances on the 16th of last month. Happily, guided by a gracious Providence, we reached Tula about ten o'clock in the evening; but I was compelled to promise eight roubles (6s. 8d.) for a warm room in an inn, before they would admit us. On approaching, we observed some houses on fire in the eastern suburbs: the stream of light reflected on the frozen atmosphere produced a remarkably beautiful effect.

I waited upon Abraham the bishop, a different man in all respects from his predecessor Simeon, with whom I established the Bible Society, in 1816. Abraham complained of the indifference manifested by the nobles towards the society; and stated, that he had made it a rule to oblige every priest, at his ordination, to furnish himself with a Bible, and every deacon to procure a Tes-Their income during the year had been 3883 roubles in subscriptions, and they had sold copies for 1070 roubles. When here at the formation of the Society, I had time more conveniently to see this interesting manufacturing town, which in many respects might be styled the Birmingham of Russia; for there are upwards of 15,000 men employed in making weapons of war and cutlery. Of these, I found 8000 engaged in the manufactories belonging to the Government, who annually prepare 120,000 stand of arms. On the machinery and improvements in these works the Government spares A steam-engine drives forty lathes, for no expense. turning the barrels of muskets. The pistols and guns made here are generally substantial, but not so finely wrought as those of British manufacture; and the same observation still applies to every species of cutlery yet fabricated here, or in any other part of the country: they are all inferior, both in the quality of the steel and in the workmanship. The rich mines of iron ore in the vicinity supply abundance of materials. Another extensive foundry belonging to Government is that of Peterozavodsk, in the government of Olonetz, erected by Peter the Great, where the cannon used in the army and navy are cast.

Tula covers a great extent of ground on both sides of the rivers Oussa and Tultza. The number of inhabitants is about 40,000. The public buildings are mostly of brick. The cathedral is one of the finest edifices of the kind in Russia; massive and well proportioned, but not elegant. The ikonostas is very rich; most of the pictures being overlaid with plates of gold and silver, through which the face and hands only of the figures are seen. There are twenty-five other churches in the town, many of them beautiful buildings; also a monastery, and a nunnery. Four bridges of stone, and five of wood, unite the different parts of the city. The streets are broad, but ill paved. as the stone used is calcareous, and lasts but a short time. The bazaar of merchants' shops is stored with every kind of luxury. The inhabitants in general are wealthy; and their manufactories of silk-stuffs. leather, ropes, hats, &c. are extensive.

I paid a visit to the Spiritual Seminary, where I found 450 students of divinity, and upwards of 600 younger scholars preparing to become such: many of them were fine-looking youths. Their library seemed principally stored with philological, philosophical, and critical works, in Latin, Slavonian, and Greek. I likewise entered the Consistory, during its session: it consisted of the bishop, the archimandrite, and several of the senior secular clergy, as assessors. They were occupied with the spiritual and temporal affairs of the diocese, which, they said, contains 847 churches, with 5000 priests and deacons, and about 8000 readers and singers. Here is also a provincial gymnasium for the sons of the laity, with several hundred students.

Accompanied by the secretary of the society, I went to see the prison, situated on a high ground without the It was in much better order than when I was here before, having been rebuilt last year. The inclosure was much like that of the Kief ostrog, which seems to be taken as a model for the outer walls of many of the provincial prisons now undergoing repair. prison itself consists of two long wooden parallel buildings, at the end of one of which is a neat chapel. We found 168 male criminals, in seven rooms: these were clean and comfortable, when compared with those of Orel and other places already described. There were a few sick in the hospital; and we found seven females confined in a room above the gateway. The prisoners earnestly entreated for copies of the Scriptures, which we promised to send to them.

One day, when here on a former occasion, the weather being fine, I took a turn to the extensive burial-ground on the top of the hill above the prison; where I mused for some time, in solemn delight, amidst thousands of tombs, on death and immortality, and the quiet rest of the Christian's grave. Afterwards I entered the magnificent church called All Saints, erected in the middle of this garden of the Resurrection; and, going up to the second floor, had a charming view of the city, and of the surrounding country. In this second story, a rudely-carved wooden image of the Saviour on the cross, at full length, took my attention; being the first, to my recollection, which I had ever seen in a church of the Greek confession, where only a superficial painting, on canvas or wood, is permitted. I afterwards inquired

State of bondage of the Russian Peasantry—Historical sketch of its origin—Present condition of the Slaves of the Crown, and of those of the Nobles—Russian Slaves have no legal rights—Anecdotes of the fidelity of Slaves—General treatment of them—Domestic Slaves—Luxury of the Nobility—Manners of the Peasantry—Want of bread little known in Russia—Baths—Kindness among the Lower Classes of the People—Dress of the Female Peasantry—Customs and Ceremonies attending Marriage, &c.

As the majority of the Russian peasantry are in a state of bondage, and, in every sense of the word, slaves to the proprietors of the lands on which they dwell, I have endeavoured to trace the origin of this vassalage in the Russian annals: the result of my inquiry I shall concisely lay before the reader, together with such information as my limits will permit on the present state of this interesting class of the inhabitants.

"The ancient Slavonians and Russians," says Karamzin, "suffered neither despotism nor slavery to exist among them, and considered unfettered liberty the chief happiness of man. The landlord was the head of the family: the father ruled over his children, the husband over his wife, the brother over his sisters; every family built its hut apart from all others, in order that they might live peaceably and in security; hence each family formed a kind of miniature republic, in which ancient usages had the force of a code of laws."

But as their acquaintance with the civilized and luxurious Greeks increased, and they learned something of the advantages of social life, they gradually became willing to forego part of their savage liberty, in order to secure new sources of gratification.

The Russian population, from the earliest ages, appears to have been divided into three classes—Boiars or nobles. similar in rank to our ancient Scottish Barons*; Ludi, consisting of warriors and freemen, and classified according to their occupation and service; and lastly. Rabi or slaves. The latter were prisoners taken in war, their descendants, and persons who had forfeited their freedom by breaking the laws: but such as had conditionally sold themselves or their children into slavery were called Halops: for, according to their usages, fathers, in their free condition, had power, by a deed called kabala, to sell their own offspring into slavery. either for a certain number of years, or during the life of the purchaser. Debtors also, who could not satisfy their creditors, became their slaves until their debts should be discharged by their labour. Others again. being unable to support their families, and desirous of living under the protection of a boiar, enrolled themselves among his vassals +. These conditional slaves were also styled zakupnie, "purchased," or kabalnie ludi,

^{*} The Boiars were bound to follow the standard of their prince; and the Ludi, or warriors, those of their Boiars. Of the booty taken in war, the prince received one half, and the other moiety was divided between the chiefs and their followers. In addition to this, the prince sometimes rewarded such as had distinguished themselves, out of his own share of the spoil. Thus the Boiars held the tenure of their lands of the prince, and the warriors of the Boiars. The power of each was in proportion to the number of men he could bring into the field.

[†] A similar practice exists among the Tartars and Circassians of the present day; and such dependants are by them called Nogars.

"vassals by contract;" and they differed from the Rabi in this, that they could not be sold or otherwise disposed of; for they, like bondmen for a limited time among the Jews, had the prospect of again returning to freedom; whereas the Rabi possessed no rights whatever, and were, in all respects, the property of their masters, who had over them the power of life and death.

The Russian historians say, that this distinction between partial and complete slavery continued to be respected until the beginning of the eighteenth century, and that, with the exceptions above specified, the great body of the Russian peasantry were free; the proprietors of the lands on which they were settled had no power either to sell them, pawn them, leave them by will to their posterity, or give them in dowry, as is done at the present day. They were at full liberty to remove from the lands of one lord, and settle on those of another, after having paid their rents agreeably to law and usage*. The time, however, of this change of residence was restricted, by a ukaz of Ivan Vasillivitch in 1550, to the week before and the week after St. George's-day, in the autumn. In consequence of this liberty of migration, the peasantry were registered every year; by which means the exact number inhabiting each district was ascertained, and the proportion of recruits, taxes, &c. levied accordingly.

But in the year 1597, Tzar Theodor Ivanovitch issued

^{*} In those parts where wood was scarce, the rent of the hut was fixed at a rouble and two alteens per annum; but in a woody country, at fifty-six kopiks. Those who occupied the hut one year had to pay one-fourth of its value; two years, the half; three years, three-fourths; and four years, the value of it. The removing peasant was also obliged to give timely warning of his intention to change, and to settle his accounts in the presence of witnesses.

a ukaz, prohibiting the free migration of the peasantry, and commanding them to be registered and kept upon the lands which they then occupied. With this edict the poorer class of the nobles were greatly pleased; because the rich boiars and bishops used to give the peasantry greater encouragement, than they could offer, to settle on their lands, and thereby had a great advantage. But the boiars, for the same reason, were dissatisfied with the arrangement; and hence the successor of Theodor, Boris Gudonoff, wishing to conciliate the boiars, revoked this statute in 1602, and the peasantry regained their former freedom.

This deliverance, however, was not of long duration; for the power and turbulence of the minor nobles was such, as to oblige Gudonoff to renew the enslaving act, by which a great body of the people were deprived of the right of free migration; and in 1607 this act was confirmed by Tzar Vasilli Ivanovitch Shinski, and sanctioned by both the civil and ecclesiastical courts. In the said ukaz, the following reason was given for this measure—" That the migration of the peasantry occasioned great confusion; and that insults and violence were endured by the weak from the strong."

In the year 1622, Tzar Michael Feodrovitch, by ukaz, commanded all the peasantry to be registered on the lands belonging to the crown and nobles; and the latter were strictly forbidden to receive such as had already been inscribed on the rolls of their neighbours. And in the Code of Tzar Alexie Michaelovitch, father of Peter the Great, chap. 11, it is enacted, "That the peasantry shall be judged according to the register-books; and in case any man be found to have removed from the place where he has been enrolled, he shall be compelled to return." From this same chapter it is also evident, says Uspenskoy, that the peasantry were already sold with the lands which they cultivated; yet still these edicts, which gradually reduced the poor peasants of Russia into bondage, did not prescribe the extent of the landholder's power over his vassals, until, in the succeeding reign of Peter the Great, the following enactments were made.

In the census taken in 1718, by order of this emperor, all the existing degrees of vassalage were set aside; and the people were reduced to one common rubric, that of rabi (slaves). By two other edicts, he commanded the lord of the manor to pay the capitation-tax for the peasantry living on his lands, and to furnish the required levies of recruits: in executing these decrees, the lord of the soil necessarily assumed unlimited power over his tenants: and at this time it became tolerated, to sell them not only in families, but also individually.

"From this period," says the Russian historian Boltin, "the nobles began to exercise the same power over the lives and property of their halops and peasants as had been exercised, in ancient times, only over prisoners taken in war." "There is indeed no law," continues he, "by which the peasant, as an individual, is made the slave of his landlord. Custom introduced them by degrees to serve in the palaces of the nobles, in direct opposition to the laws on this subject; and under the denomination of domestics they came to be sold individually; and this, being tolerated at the commencement, has, by length of time and usage, obtained the power of law." Such, briefly, is the history of the enslavement of the great body of the peasantry of Russia, by the conjoint efforts of their Tzars and nobles.

One cannot calmly reflect on the part which Peter the First took in this transaction, without its diminishing our opinion of his greatness. With the one hand, he did much to exalt and civilize Russia; but with the other he counterbalanced this benefit, by riveting the chains of slavery and oppression upon the great body of his unfortunate subjects.

The emperor Alexander felt deeply for the degraded state of the common Russians, and, by various edicts, sought to ameliorate their condition, and to ease the weight of their chains; but such is the power and influence of the nobles, that, in a case like this, even the autocratic power of the ruler becomes comparatively powerless.

We shall now endeavour to lay before the reader a view of the present condition of the Russian slaves, who compose the most numerous class of subjects.

They may properly be divided into two orders—slaves belonging to the crown, and slaves belonging to the nobles. In the former division are included, first, the peasants who are settled on crown lands, and therefore considered national property: next, the slaves who formerly belonged to the bishops, monasteries, and churches, but were appropriated to the use of the Government in 1764. These enjoy greater privileges than those belonging to the nobles; because they have full power over the fruits of their own fields and labour, and can dispose of their moveable property as they please. By an edict of the emperor Alexander in 1801, they are permitted to hold lands, but not slaves; and, with the consent of their stewards, to carry on trade of any kind, to become merchants, manufacturers, &c. &c. They generally live in large villages, and are governed by their own elders or starosti, who collect the taxes, ballot for recruits, and regulate the common affairs of the village community. But though, in this division, the great body are possessed of superior privileges, yet the lot of vast numbers is singularly severe; for of the peasantry belonging to the empire, many thousands are employed in the mines, others in manufactories belonging to the Government, many even in those of private individuals. All the various establishments in Russia known under the names of fabrics and zavods are worked by slaves. For instance: two or three hundred are sent to some cloth manufactory, to become weavers and dyers; an equal number to some foundry, to become engineers, smiths, carpenters, &c. &c.; though totally unacquainted with these trades. Nor is it uncommon to make grants of the labour of the crown peasantry to foreign speculators in different branches of foreign manufactures, which the Government are desirous of encouraging among their subjects: and, alas! it is too frequently the lot of the poor peasantry to experience harsh and severe treatment in these institutions; where, for a sorry subsistence, they and their offspring are condemned to labour during the remainder of their lives, to enrich some needy foreigner whom Government (with a view, nevertheless, of promoting the public good) thinks proper thus to favour. greater number of the manufactories belonging to the crown are likewise under the direction of foreigners, each of whom has for workmen, his troop of slaves; varying in number, from a hundred to many thousands, according to the extent of the works*.

^{*} The merchants who have manufactories are generally supplied with workmen from the slaves of the nobility; as few of them are permitted to hold slaves on any condition themselves, and free workmen are not to be obtained. A regulation was however made some years ago, permitting merchant-manufacturers to purchase slaves to be employed in their

This class of the slaves, attached to the mines, manufactories, and public works of Government, or of individuals, are greatly to be pitied, on account of the scanty means of subsistence usually allowed them, the hard labour they have to endure, and the almost total neglect of their moral and religious improvement. But the desire of the ruling powers to advance civilization, commerce, the revenues of the crown, and the political influence of the nation, closes both eyes and ears to the miseries endured by more than 250,000 slaves thus employed throughout the empire. I know that a Russian, well acquainted with the state of our manufacturing poor in England, might reply, that some of the above disadvantages are equally manifest among them; but, in all such comparisons, we must never lose sight of the great and essential difference between lawless bondage, and liberty secured by law. The English operative is a freeman, and has his choice both of labour and master, and a full power over his earnings: the Russian workman is a slave, deprived of these invaluable blessings.

The emperor Alexander, during the whole period of his reign, did in no instance, I believe, transfer crown slaves in grants to his ministers and generals, for services rendered to the state, as had been the custom of preceding sovereigns. How many tens of thousands of these poor creatures were given by Catherine II., not only as rewards to the able men who had served in her armies and in her councils, but to enrich her favourites! The usual method adopted by Alexander was, to limit their fabrics, on condition of granting them their freedom at the end of eighteen years' service. It was further provided by this edict, that for the first twelve years they shall labour without any remuneration whatever, except food and clothing; for the remaining six years, wages are allowed them.

his grants from the crown lands and peasantry, in reward of services rendered to the country, to twelve years. This kind of benefice is called Arends. The person receiving such grant has the revenues of the villages for the period specified; after which, they revert to the crown, though sometimes the time is prolonged by a renewal of the grant.

In writing to a nobleman, to whom he had granted an Arende, the emperor says*, "The peasants of Russia are for the greater part slaves: it is unnecessary for me to enlarge upon the degradation and misery of such a state. I have sworn, therefore, not to increase the number of these wretched beings; and have laid it down as a principle, not to dispose of peasants as of property. The estate is granted to yourself, and your posterity, as a tenure for life; which is a tenure differing from those generally granted, in this point alone, that the peasants cannot be sold or alienated, as beasts of burden. You know my motives: I am convinced you would act in the same manner, were you in my place."

We come next to speak of the condition of the slaves belonging to the nobility, who are estimated at upwards of twenty-one millions, male and female; whereas those belonging to the crown are not above fourteen millions.

The property of a Russian nobleman, in modern times, is not estimated in proportion to the extent of territory he possesses; but by the number of the resident peasantry, or, in the idiom of the country, "the number of souls he possesses." According to the ukazes of the late emperor of 1808 and 1812, they are not in future to be individually sold, or separated from the lands they cultivate; yet there are many ways, still in practice, of frustrating the object of these benevolent edicts. By a ukaz of 1782, the slaves may be removed, with their families, from one part of the empire to another; which kind of colonization has been much practised since the conquest of the peninsula of the Crimea, Besarabia, and the northern parts of the Caucasus, where numerous villages of peasantry, from the interior of Russia, are now settled.

Uspenskoy further affirms, that, according to the 2d and 22d chapters of the Russian code, and the ukazes of 1767 and 1797, the slaves have no right in law against their masters; for every complaint of the slave against him is considered an act of rebellion. Consequently, such of the nobles as employ their own slaves in their manufactories, &c., work them as they please, being under no restrictions. Until 1811, the nobles had power to send their refractory slaves into exile to Siberia; but this power was taken from them by the late benevolent sovereign; and at present they can only be exiled after judgment has been regularly passed upon them in the common courts of justice.

Up to the present day, properly speaking, the Russian slave has no rights, and can possess no property: himself, his wife, his children, and all that he possesses, are the property of his lord. He is not allowed to purchase any moveable effects, to become surety for any one, to contract debts, to enter into trade of any kind, without the express permission of his lord; on whose will, also, his entry into the matrimonial state entirely depends. And though the laws of the Church do not allow the marriage-knot to be tied unless with the willing consent of both parties, yet it but too commonly happens, that this most important of all unions is brought about by the interest of the lord, or the caprice of his stewards, and not by the mutual affection of the parties chiefly concerned.—How can agriculture or any other national interest prosper, where the labourer has, in law, no personal possession, no personal freedom, no excitement to industry? But I need not enlarge: he who has been born and nursed in the lap of a freedom, regulated by just laws, can at once appreciate all the miseries naturally resulting from such a system of thraldom.

Those who have read and heard the arguments often used, in a British Parliament, in favour of a much more inhuman system of slavery in the West Indies, will scarcely be surprised at the apologies made by the nobility of Russia for the lordship which they exercise over their vassals. They say: "Our people are still in a state of infancy, and our laws and usages treat them as such. The system itself is most humane and merciful, when the Noble acts in the spirit of it. He is not to consider himself as the despotic tyrant, but as the father of his peasantry; and they are to be regarded as his children, for whom he is answerable in all cases, and for whom also he has to provide: it is merely the abuses of the system which make it so abhorrent to free foreigners. Put laws and usages out of the questionlay aside all your fine-sounding theories about freedom and the happiness of liberty—and then look into our villages, and compare the natural condition of the Russian boor with that of the same class of men in Ireland, in some parts of England, and upon the Continent; and you will come to the just conclusion, that our people suffer less, and enjoy more, than the most of their brethren in those countries. And after all, they are as free as we are; for the Tzar has as much power over us as we have over them: we, our children, and our property, are as entirely at his disposal as the persons and property of our vassals are at ours." Apologies in this strain are in the mouth of every considerate, patriotic, loyal Russian noble. But there are others of them still more patriotic, and not less loyal, who earnestly wish to see the peasantry restored to their ancient freedom, and to have an equitable system of law introduced for all classes.

Justice, however, compels me to state, that I am acquainted with many noblemen who govern their peasantry upon truly paternal principles, and take great pains to promote the prosperity, health, and comfort of their slaves. To such masters the slaves not unfrequently shew great attachment, of which the following anecdote is an instance:—

On the 15th of October 1808 died, in Moscow, Prince Paul Michaelovitch Volhonsky, aged 46. Hearing of the event, two hundred of his slaves came, with their senior at their head, from the village belonging to the prince, near that city, and entreated to be permitted to carry his body to the grave; saying, "We are come to take farewell of our father—we will carry his corpse in our arms to its grave." The relations of the prince were greatly touched by this proof of affection to the deceased; but informed the peasantry, that he would not be interred in Moscow, but in the monastery of Barofsk, where his ancestors lay, upwards of ninety versts from that city. The information seemed only to augment ^{*}Hence the ancient practice among them, of subscribing themselves, when addressing the Tzar, "Halop." By a ukaz of Peter the Great this was changed into Rab, "slave." But, in 1786, Catherine softened down this humiliating epithet into Vsepoddaneischee Slugå, "Most obedient servant;" which form of signature still continues.

Their number soon increased to three hundred. In the midst of all the severities of a Russian winter, they divided themselves into companies, and, relieving each other every two versts, performed this last service to one whom they considered not so much their lord as their tender father; regarding it as a privilege to be permitted thus to shew their attachment to his memory.

The following is an instance of fidelity in the slave, from religious principle, to the interests of his master, even at a time when a foreign enemy was in vain entreating him and ten thousands of his brethren to cast the yoke from their necks.

In the year 1812, while the country was overrun by the French, Alexander Froloff was senior in the village of Smerdina, belonging to Mr. Bulgakoff. All the peasantry in the neighbourhood were already flying for safety in different directions; and they advised him to sell off the corn in the magazine belonging to his lord, and to fly also. Alexander refused this advice: "The will of God be done," said he: "my duty is to take care of the corn: I have no orders to sell it:" and he continued to labour in his master's service. Already the enemy was within nine versts of the village, and had laid a bridge over the river Cleazma; yet the senior continued his work. He carted home all the corn which was still in the fields belonging to his lord, and took proper care of what was in the house. And after the retreat of the enemy, when he first saw his master again, he exclaimed: "I fear not now to die—I have been faithful to my charge—God has enabled me to save all your property." His example and advice were the means also of keeping many from abandoning the neighbouring villages: and when thanked for it by their proprietors, he usually replied—"God has had mercy upon us all!"

And though the obrok or capitation-tax, laid upon the peasant at the discretion of his lord, differs in amount according to the circumstances of the master and the slave, yet the sum usually levied by wealthy nobles is very moderate, and not by any means an equivalent for the privileges they enjoy, from his lands, and protection. We do not deny, then, that certain advantages are connected with this system of government: what we complain of, is, that an irresponsible power should be lodged in the hands of so many, over the great body of the subjects. The actual state of the great mass of the Russian vassals, in point of enjoyment, may perhaps be, in some respects, better than that of many of the free poor in some other countries; yet in point of law and privilege there is an infinite distance between them. A plentiful supply of what is required to mere animal existence is not to prejudice us in favour of bondage: a man may be kept in bondage in chains of gold, as well as in fetters of iron; and it may even be said, that the very opulence of many of the peasantry belonging to the Orloffs, Demidoffs, and Sheremetoffs of Russia is calculated, like the golden chain, not to ease, but increase the weight of their burthen.

Some of the slaves belonging to these and other rich nobles have purchased estates, have built and furnished splendid houses in the capitals, and carry on extensive commerce in the name of their lords. And it is the pride of these nobles to possess such wealthy vassals, and no money will induce them to emancipate them. The yoke of vassalage, therefore, is kept upon their shoulders, even when Fortune has showered upon them her golden treasure. That the children of such slaves must feel deeply mortified, with all the light which modern education and manners throw around them, is not difficult to be conceived.

The late emperor had a great desire to see the poor Russian mujik raised from his low and servile vassalage, into the rank of a free man; but his plans for bringing this about met with determined opposition on the part of the principal boiars of the empire; and since his decease, I know of no effectual effort that has been made, on the part of the Government, to accelerate this most desirable event.

No method, I am persuaded, could be so safely followed by the Government, for restoring the Russian slaves to their ancient freedom of migration, and to a participation in the rights of free citizens, as that of causing, by legislation, the capitation-taxes, and other value now placed upon the head of the slave, to fall upon the land which he cultivates. Such a measure, while it delivered the serf from the power of the noble and his steward, would immediately place him under the controul and protection of an equitable system of law in the hands of magistrates. It would secure to the Government and nobles their usual revenues, in the shape of rent from their estates, without risking the tranquillity of the empire during so important a change.

The late emperor, Alexander, restored liberty of migration to the serfs of Esthonia and Courland, and placed them, with the consent of their nobles, in the condition of free men: and surely the Russian Government, and the nobles also, will soon be convinced of this great truth, that their own interest depends upon their following that example! for the Russians, as a people, can never attain to the privileges and to the high character of other civilized, enlightened, and free nations of Europe, until the great mass of the inhabitants of the empire shall have been raised up from this equally unjust and unchristian state of vassalage.

The slaves of rich nobles generally enjoy a much greater degree of freedom than those of the poorer class. They are left to cultivate their own land, to engage in traffic, and follow trades in the towns, being supplied with a passport from their lord; but they pay at the rate of from ten to thirty roubles, obrok, for every male in their families*.

Those are in a much worse condition who are obliged to work for their masters three days in the week, and have only the remaining days to cultivate their own fields and gain support for their families. But the peasantry belonging to poor nobles are circumstanced worst of all, because the necessities of their masters demand of them the most of their time. It is to this class that acts of oppression and inhumanity most frequently happen. In consequence of these petty lords possessing little property, or living above their income, their agricultural peasants are burthened, while their domestic slaves drag out a life of idleness, scanty subsistence, and misery. And the number of such petty nobles is daily increasing, from two causes: First, from the subdivision of property in every successive generation; as, according to the Russian law, the estates of the father are divided among his children: secondly, from the constant augmentation of the nobility, through rank obtained in the military and civil services; as every one, on attaining the rank of captain, is thereby ennobled. An attempt, however, in some measure to remedy this evil, was made by a ukaz of 1822, which restricted the liberty of purchasing slaves to nobles of a higher grade.

^{*} A rouble is worth about ten-pence, being of the same value in the present day as a French franc.

Many of the nobles pass a great part of the year on their estates, and themselves direct the agricultural and other rural employments of their vassals; visiting Moscow, with their families, only for a few months or weeks in winter, according as their circumstances allow. But a far greater portion of them entrust the government of their villages to stewards; who live among the peasantry, superintend the cultivation of that part of the estate, the produce of which is exclusively for the lord, sell the corn at the neighbouring markets, and remit the revenue to the family, resident in Moscow or in some other town. Another method adopted by many is, to let out their estate for a certain number of years to farmers, who are, alas! too often left at full liberty to work the peasantry and land as they please.

But it is the interest of the noble to care for the wellbeing of his peasantry; for on this depends his own revenues. And here we find the counteracting principle to much that is bad; for in case of famine or other misfortunes, he is bound to provide for his people, to supply them with seed to sow their fields, and with food till the new crop appears. And when the slave grows old, and cannot any longer work, the lord is bound, by law, to take care of him. I have repeatedly heard the peasant refer to this, as an anchor of hope in old age; though few, comparatively, of those who belong to poor nobles, ever enjoy ease and competency in advanced age. knew a female servant, who at the age of sixty, after having borne thirteen children, had not only to work for her own bread, but annually to pay to the young lady whose property she was, sixty roubles (2l. 8s.) capitation-tax.

The general intercourse between a Russian noble and his vassal is marked, nevertheless, by a certain degree of humanity and Christian sympathy. In common conversation, the slave always addresses him by the name of "Father;" and the lord designates his slave, "Brother;" and when speaking to more than one, he calls them "Children." Harsh treatment, and even cruel usage or chastisement, do occasionally take place; but this is not so often at the instigation of the lord as of the steward.

The greater part of the domestic slaves, male and female, are unmarried, and form a distinct class of them-Their numbers are so great, that free scope is given to idleness, and to habits which ruin their constitution and vitiate their morals. It is not unusual to find, in a single family of the nobility, thirty or forty females, from sixteen to thirty years of age, all unmarried, most of them employed the whole year in embroidery and other needle-work; with as many, or more, men-servants, under the denomination of coachmen, grooms, lacqueys, &c., spending a life of sloth, three-fourths of whom might be more advantageously employed as artisans, or cultivators of the soil. But the pride and assumed dignity of the family would, in their estimation, suffer, were they to retrench their numbers, even though many find it difficult to support them. And this kind of courtly display increases in proportion to the means of the noble; so that it is no uncommon thing to find from 200 to 500 of these domestics attached to the residence of the principal boiars, forming bands of musicians, actors, singers, and dancers; and others of them trained to mechanic arts of all kinds, from the painter and watchmaker to the smith and chimney-sweeper. When reading the account given by Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," of the manner of life, travelling, domestic fêtes, luxury, and splendor, in which the patricians of Rome lived under the emperors, with troops of slaves ministering to their pride and pleasure, I have frequently said to myself—"What is this, but a description, in every leading feature, of the characters and lives of the modern Russian boiars!" I remember seeing a chivalric carousal, or tournament, prepared and acted by the nobles of Moscow, the year before the French entered Russia, at which there were upwards of 100,000 spectators; and which, for the beauty of the horses, the richness of their trappings, and the splendid dresses of the riders, probably surpassed in brilliancy even the public fêtes of Ancient Rome.

There is a remarkable trait of domestic character in the advice given to his children by the Tzar Vladimir II., son of Sviatopolk, who began to reign in 1113. The words are contained in his will. "Be not careless," says he, "of the state of your house; but look into every thing yourselves, so that strangers may not laugh at your house and your table. What belonged to my slave to do, while in the field or a hunting, I myself have performed; and the whole order of my household affairs is of my own arranging."

It were well if the modern Russian nobles possessed domestic virtues similar to what is here recommended; but many of them are little acquainted with the state of their own affairs, and are entirely in the power of mercenary agents, whom they employ to superintend their estates, to collect the obrok (taxes) from the peasantry, and forward it to them in Petersburg and Moscow, to be expended in the gay and dissipated circles of those capitals.

Hospitality is still an eminent virtue among the Russians. In proportion as civilization increases, indeed, taverns and hotels become more general, and the entertainment of strangers in private families less common; but in the interior, the stranger is welcomed at almost every hut, and kindly offered a part of the frugal fare possessed by its inmates. Brown bread, eggs, milk, salted cucumbers, radishes, &c. &c., are readily produced by the mujik and his wife, in their humble izba; and it is seldom that they will consent to accept any compensation. In fact, they have a bye-word which strictly forbids this; for they say, "To take payment for the bread and salt which a passing stranger consumes in thy dwelling is a great sin." No one has experienced more of this national virtue than myself; for though I have probably visited Moscow upwards of ten different times, each time remaining from three to six weeks, yet I never spent a night or dined at an inn in that city; and I remember to have lodged at an inn only once in St. Petersburg, and that was on my first arrival in the country, in 1805.

The peasantry have generally robust and vigorous constitutions, capable of enduring the hardest labour and the severest privations. They think nothing of working fourteen hours out of the twenty-four, day after day, in the severest heat of summer, with only bread and salt for food, and a can of quass to drink; and they will travel on similar fare, with their sledges laden with frozen provisions and other produce, to the great marts in the two capitals, for a thousand miles successively, resting five hours and journeying five alternately, night and day, at the rate of from fifty to sixty versts in the twenty-four hours, and frequently in frost from 15° to 25° Reaumur. In 1809, I made a tour, in company with such a caravan of sledges, for 800 miles; and, as the frost was for a few days excessive, being more than 30°, and commonly from 15° to 25°, frost-bitten ears, noses, cheeks, hands, and feet, were very common. The only remedies applied, were immersion of the part in cold water, and rubbing with snow. But, notwithstanding all their precaution, it is customary every spring, after a severe winter, to see hundreds of the peasantry with excoriated cheeks and noses, which, in appearance, very much resemble the marks left by scalds and burns. In the above-mentioned winter of 1809, the severest frost took place in January; and about 250 miles on this side of Astrachan, I had an opportunity, one day, during its continuance, of seeing the phænomenon of two suns; the natural sun being reflected in the frozen moisture of the atmosphere, as in a mirror: but the face of nature looked dreary beyond conception; the birds fell frozen to the ground in their flight; and multitudes of cattle, sheep, and especially camels, belonging to the poor Kalmucks in those parts, for which no shelter is provided in winter, shared no better fate.

Want of bread is rarely known among the Russian people. There is everywhere, except on occasion of a failure in the crops, a plentiful supply of it. Their natural wants are but few, and those soon provided for. There is an abundance of uncultivated land in the provinces, sufficient to support three or four times the population now upon it. Their steppes support countless numbers of horned cattle, sheep, and horses; their woods abound in game, and their rivers in fish. They are therefore in no want of the first necessaries of life; and with its luxuries, brandy and beer excepted, they are still pretty generally unacquainted. They are much addicted to the warm bath; which, if too frequently used, is certainly hurtful to the constitution, even of the strongest; but as used once a week by the peasantry, it is a salutary àuxiliary to cleanliness, and is seldom found detrimental to health.

The bath used by them is properly a vapour-bath.

It consists of an oven, over which is erected a small square building of block wood, well caulked, and made close in every part. This oven is half filled with loose stones; and when these are made red-hot by heating the oven, water is cast on them, until the house is filled with hot vapour, in which the individual stretches himself, upon a high or a low bench, according as he wishes to be in a great or moderate heat: here he continues for fifteen or twenty minutes, and is beaten and rubbed with a birch-broom with the leaves on it; he then washes his whole body in water heated in pots in the oven, dresses, and returns home. Every village has several of these baths for the use of its inhabitants.

The Russian peasant is careful of taking cold: even in the middle of summer, after a hot day, should the wind veer towards the north or east, he instantly resorts to his winter shoub or sheep-skin coat; and at no season would he think of undertaking a journey without having his shoub along with him.

A remarkable flow of civility and kindness is observable among the lower classes of the people. They seem to pay a high regard to each other's good wishes, and are courteous and even pious in their common mode of intercourse. On entering the hut where the family are at meal, it is necessary, after salutation, to say, "Hleb da sol," "Bread and salt:" on hearing this, the father of the family, or eldest of the company, replies, "Dobro pojalovat hleba soli kushat," "You are welcome to eat of the bread and the salt." From this manner of salutation, hospitality is frequently styled hlebosolstvo; from hleb, "bread," and sol, "salt."

On passing by while others are at work, the stranger exclaims, "Bogh iv pomotch!" "May God be your help!" The labourers reply, "Spasiba," "Salvation to thee!"

To those who undertake a journey, the usual parting wish is, "Svami Bogh," which answers to our "Adieu!" to which the party leaving, replies, "Prosti," "Forgive," viz. "if in any thing I have offended." This is a very general mode of expression; and probably arose, at first, from the great stress laid upon this word in the Lord's Prayer, where we are so emphatically taught the importance of mutual forgiveness.

In general, the Russian, of whatever class, never undertakes any work of importance until he has crossed himself, and sought the Divine protection. And before undertaking a journey, it is customary for the rich merchants, and many among the nobles, to go to church, and to have a special service for imploring that the Divine blessing may go with them: the emperor does Others again invite the priest, with his deacon and psalmodists, to their own houses, where prayers are offered up, in the midst of the domestic circle, before the image of the tutelary saint of the family; domestics, children, and friends, attending. I do not mean to say that prayers are directly offered to the saints on this occasion, any more than on any other; but that, as it is the general custom of the Russians never to pray unless they have a crucifix, or the picture of the Saviour, of the Virgin, or of some saint of the Kalendar before them, so, on this occasion also, the prayers are offered up before the family obraz (sacred picture). At the commencement of a battle, it is the custom of the Russian soldiers not merely to offer up prayers for mercy and deliverance, but also, whenever circumstances admit, to receive absolution and the holy sacrament.

The peculiar usages of this people, however, have undergone great changes since the time of Peter the First; among others, the familiarity of intercourse between the sexes has, within the last fifty years, approximated much nearer to European manners than could have been expected. Before the time of the great Russian innovator, the female sex, among the nobles and merchants, were kept in a state of seclusion, nearly in the same manner as in other eastern countries—shut up from the view of strangers, and allowed no familiar society with the other sex. They were to be seen, indeed, by none of either sex, with the exception of their nearest relations; and in the sixteenth century, this Mohammedan custom had obtained so firm a hold among the nobles, that they never allowed their wives and their daughters to see their nearest male relatives. They were restrained from visiting the churches, except on great holidays; and even then they went muffled up, and veiled, under proper escort. I call this rigorous law of seclusion a Mohammedan custom; because I have observed, that whenever their power has been exercised over Christian nations for any length of time, as, for instance, in the case of the Greeks, they leave behind them many of their peculiarities and usages, and especially their jealous treatment of the female sex.

The first step towards the emancipation of the Russian females from this severe yoke consisted in its becoming fashionable for the ladies of Moscow to make a short visit to the dining-room after dinner, and to hand to each of the husband's guests a glass of nalivki or liquor: having performed this, they again retired into their own apartments. It is said, moreover, that on certain occasions, when the landlord wished to shew a peculiar mark of regard for his guests, he would request them in his presence to salute his wife and daughters. Probably this took place in imitation of the German mode of salutation, (which, even to the present day, is not considered as complete, without a mutual salute on both cheeks;) for at that time numbers of Germans resided in Moscow, to whom a particular district of the city was allotted, and called the German sloboda or "settlement."

But their historians say, that the first time that even the wife of the Tzar made her appearance in public, was when Alexie Michaelovitch performed a pilgrimage to the monastery of Holy Sergie, about sixty-four versts north of Moscow, accompanied by his Tzaritza, in an open carriage. But so unaccustomed, were the Russians to such a scene, that, it is said, most of the spectators either hung down their heads as the Tzaritza passed by, or turned their faces away from her. Sophia, however, the aspiring sister of Peter, followed the example set her by this princess; and used to converse openly, not merely with the ministers of state, and with foreign ambassadors, but even with the officers and common soldiers of the Strelitzi.

Peter, when he came to the throne, endeavoured, by the introduction of theatrical and other amusements among the people, to produce that amalgamation and free intercourse between the sexes, which he had observed to be productive of so many benefits and comforts in other Christian countries: and at last, in 1700, he issued a ukaz, encouraging females of all ranks to a modest and free intercourse with the other sex; and forbidding both the married and unmarried to wear the veil at weddings, funerals, feasts, and other public occasions. He, further, began to invite the boiars, with their wives and daughters, to entertainments at court, which he gave in the European style; and commanded them to appear and partake of them, dressed in the European fashion. These efforts having been carried on during the succeeding reign, have proved completely successful in emancipating the female sex, among the nobles in Russia, from the harems* in which their fair ancestors used to be confined. But a remnant of this ancient custom is still observed in the domestic circle of the merchants in the interior, whose wives and daughters seldom see strangers; and, when they do, appear to feel a very considerable degree of shyness, agitation, and constraint. Every year, however, is both reducing the number of beards and long garments among this class of the Russian subjects, and bringing their sons and daughters more and more under the power of European fashions.

The Russian maidens have their hair plaited, hanging down behind, and bound at the end with a ribbon, which reaches to the hem of their sarafan or upper robe. addition to this, a band frequently encircles the brow. made of gold or silver, hair, or silk. It is looked upon by the peasantry as a great shame for a married woman to appear anywhere bareheaded, but especially in the church; and it is only occasionally among the great that the apostolic regulation, in this respect, is dispensed with: the common people and merchants' wives pay the strictest attention to it. The wives of the lower order are careful not to expose their bare heads in the presence even of their own husbands, or to dress their hair before them. On one occasion, the late metropolitan, Platon, is said to have reproved a noble lady sharply in the presence of the congregation, when she approached the altar bareheaded, after the service, to receive his benediction.

The head-dresses of the married females in the provinces differ very much: in some parts, they are modest and very becoming; in others, again, they are exceedingly fanciful and unwieldy, as may be seen in the Russian costumes which have been given by Kerr Porter and others. These head-dresses are called kokoshniki: they are made of pasteboard, and covered with silk brocades of lively colours, or embroidered with gold and silver. The kokoshniki (which, with the sarafan, a pair of ear-rings, and a small band around the waist, form the chief articles of a Russian female's upper dress—a dress, at once simple, elegant, and becoming) is the general costume of the ladies at court.

Polygamy was customary among the heathen Russians. When Vladimir the Great embraced the Christian faith, he had five wives, and a great number of concubines: the former were all divorced before he was wedded to the Grecian princess, Anne. What were the peculiar customs of the Russians before they became Christians, in regard to the rites of marriage, is not known. That this ceremony was usually celebrated in their temples before their idols, seems probable, from mention made in the Russian annals of the marriage of Olga with Igor, in the year 903, as having been performed with great ceremony and feasting in the temple of Perun at Pleskoff. To the present day, there still remain a number of superstitious customs connected with marriage, which can only be traced to ancient heathen usages. The application of the whip, for instance, to the back of the bride, by the bridegroom, on the wedding-night, at the side of the bridal bed, while she is employed in taking off his boots, as a mark of her complete subjection to her husband, is probably of this kind. This custom is no longer to be found among the higher classes of the Russians, in the present day; but is still practised among the common people, in certain parts of the interior. The great fears entertained of the influence of witchcraft over the new-married pair; the employing of exorcists, called znatoki, to counteract this influence; the putting them to sleep upon straw, in a room which has never been heated and never inhabited, and other usages of a like kind, which in many parts remain to this day, evidently originated in superstition.

At the solemnization of marriage, there must be the svaha (pronuba), drushko (paranymphus), devochnik (protelea), and the ring persten (arrha); all of which usages are borrowed from the Greeks. The marriage ceremony is always performed before the altar, and consists of three parts: First, the betrothing, in which the parties exchange rings, in pledge of their mutual love and fidelity. The second is the matrimonial coronation, and is properly the rite of marriage: in this, the priest, having pointed out the duties of the matrimonial state, and interrogated the parties in respect to their mutual consent, crowns the bridegroom first; saying, "The servant of God, M., is crowned for the handmaid of God N., in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Then taking the second crown, he puts it on the head of the bride, saying, "The handmaid of God, N., is crowned for the servant of God, M., in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The third part of the ceremony is the dissolving of the crowns, in which the priest concludes with this prayer: "We thy servants, O Lord, having ratified the contract and performed the office of marriage, as in Cana of Galilee, and laid up the symbols of it, give glory to Thee, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, even unto ages of ages."

In former times, the crowns used were garlands of flowers; but at present every church has two crowns, either of gold or of silver, which are used in this ceremony.—All these offices belonging to marriage are now united in one service; but they were formerly performed at different times.—No marriages are solemnized in the time of Lent: and a fourth marriage is altogether unlawful in the Greek Church.

Before the influx of European customs, the contract for marriages was formed by the parents and relatives; and the bridegroom was never permitted to see his bride until the ceremony of betrothing took place. This custom was strictly observed, even in regard to the daughters of the Tzars; for when the emperor Frederick III. sent an ambassador to Ioanna Vasillivitch, in 1498, demanding one of the daughters of the Tzar in marriage to a member of the Imperial family, and the ambassador requested permission to see the grand-duchess, he received for answer, "that the Princesses of Russia could not be seen before their betrothing." Peter the Great thought proper, however, to do away with this remnant of eastern severity; and ordained, by a ukaz in the year 1700, that in future the bride and bridegroom should have an opportunity of seeing each other, several times, before their union; and that a mutual request should be made by the parties themselves to enter into wedlock; and until this should have taken place, the priest was commanded not to solemnize the ceremony.

The example set by Vladimir, of marrying a foreign princess, was followed by several of his successors. When, however, Russia became divided into principalities, the reigning princes usually chose their consorts from among the princesses of their own nation; and after the union of these principalities into one state, they chose them from among their own subjects—a practice which continued until the days of Peter I. The ceremony of selecting a consort for the Tzar, of which so much has been said in various books of travels, took place, according to the Russian writers, in the following manner.

The virgins most distinguished for beauty and accomplishments in the dominions of the Tzar were assembled in Moscow, and privately examined by persons appointed, before they were admitted as candidates for the hand of This examination, and indeed the whole business, was confided to the care of certain boiars of the first rank, and their wives. Those who were considered suitable persons were admitted into the palace of the Tzar, and apartments were assigned to each of them. They were entertained at one table during their stay, and passed their time in social amusements befitting their years and station. In the mean time, the Tzar frequently paid them a visit incognito, overheard their conversation, and made his own remarks upon them. After a very mature examination, carried on in this secret manner (no doubt on account of the national usage, that no intercourse could take place between the parties before marriage), and when the Tzar had fixed upon the virgin he intended to raise to his throne, he paid them a public visit at their table, and gave to the lady of his choice a handkerchief and a ring. On each of the rest, also, he bestowed a handkerchief, and they returned to their respective homes. The chosen maiden was then publicly proclaimed as the intended of the Tzar, under the name of Grand Princess; and in the prayers of the church, until the marriage ceremony took place, she was remembered as the chosen bride of the Tzar.

The exact number of young females for such an occasion was not fixed. When Natalia (the mother of Peter the Great) was chosen by Alexie Michaelovitch, their number was sixty. It is recorded, that when Vasilli Joanovitch had to make his choice, no fewer than 1500 damsels were assembled.

It was the custom of the Russians of all ranks to marry their children very early, even before the age of puberty: but Peter, by a ukaz of 23d March 1714, strictly prohibited the nobles from entering the married state before the age of twenty for the bridegroom, and seventeen for the bride. Catherine II., by a ukaz in 1775, reduced the legal age of marriage, to seventeen for the male, and thirteen for the female. This custom of early marriage still prevails; and in innumerable instances, especially among the common people, it is fraught with very pernicious consequences, both to the physical and moral state of the parties. Many shocking instances have been known among the peasantry, of a breach of the laws of consanguinity in consequence of these premature marriages. By a recent ukaz of the present emperor, Nicholas, (1831,) the priests are forbidden to solemnize marriage unless the man be eighteen, and the bride sixteen years old: and this edict extends also to the Uniats and Protestants in the empire. —From the time that Christian marriage was introduced among the Russians, it was made a regulation, that the parties intending to unite should procure a written permission from the ecclesiastical authorities, certifying that no legal obstacle stood in the way of the union. certificates were called uenetchnik pamiataeh, "memorials of marriage;" and the tax raised from them always belonged to the bishop of the diocese. But Peter the Great, by a ukaz of the 25th of January 1709, ordered the revenue arising from these certificates to be employed in supporting hospitals: and Catherine II., by a ukaz of the 20th of June, and 14th of July, 1765, set aside this very ancient usage altogether, and ordered marriage to be solemnized, without certificate, on the testimony of two witnesses.

Leaving Tula, we took the road for Sarpuha and Moscow. We still found the cold intense, and the snows deep, and sometimes drifting, which made our way peculiarly dangerous. About the middle of the second stage we fell in with a poor peasant, lying across his sledge weeping: his jaded horse could proceed no further, his companions had left him, and he was afraid of perishing by the frost. I gave him some assistance in money; and advised him to return to a village about two versts distant.

We continued to travel through the night, though often in imminent danger of losing the track from the drifting snows. However, under the guidance of a gracious Providence, we reached Sarpuha two hours past midnight; and, continuing our course, arrived safely in Moscow about two in the afternoon of the 5th of January, O.S.; and took up our lodgings in the house of the Moscow Bible Society. What a change is observable in the appearance of Moscow, since I was last here,

The city seems to have put on a new dress of unprecedented splendor: the vast number of new buildings, the elegance with which the old brick palaces and houses have been replaced since the conflagration, the new painting and gilding of the churches and steeples, the regularity of the new streets, &c. &c., seem far to outstrip the pristine grandeur of this ancient metropolis. Still greater is the contrast which the city now presents to the state of devastation in which I found it in 1813, when I came here to establish the Moscow Bible Society; and when, for fourteen days successively, I drove among the ruins, covering an area of nearly twenty miles in circumference, in search of such of the nobility and clergy as had returned from their flight, and were likely to join me in laying the foundation of the institution! And when we met in an upper room of the College for Foreign Affairs, situated on a hill near the centre of the city, from whence we had an extensive view on all sides of the boundless scene of desolation and destruction, how did some of the aged Russians, most of whom are now no more, weep over it, especially when the late archbishop Augustine, in his address, called their attention to the waste state of the virgin daughter of Russia, emphatically known among the people by the name "Our Mother Moskva," and proposed to them to commence the restoration of the city, by founding a society to the glory of God and the spiritual benefit of her scattered sons and daughters!

But I shall not attempt a particular description of this ancient capital, even in its present state; because this would require a volume, and would not accord with the object of this publication. A few remarks must suffice.

Moscow exercises great influence on the other cities of the empire. It is, properly speaking, the centre of its commerce and power; being situated in a fertile and healthy plain, surrounded by a country which produces abundantly for the support of its numerous population, and having extensive water communication with many of the provinces, by the river Moscow, which flows at the foot of its ancient citadel, the Kremlin, and divides the city into two parts. It is the rendezvous of the nobility and merchants of Russia. The former have filled it with palaces; the latter with wooden huts. Every noble family of distinction has its dvor or family residence in Moscow, placed in the centre of a large plot of ground; and attached to it, a court-yard, gardens, stables, and dwellings for their troops of domestics. Here they usually pass their long winters. And as every nobleman builds according to his own fancy, and the numerous tribes of merchants and mechanics follow this example, and erect brick, or more commonly wooden houses of every size and figure in the spaces between these stately palaces, the reader may picture to himself the grotesque assemblage of edifices, mean and majestic, of all descriptions, of which Moscow was composed, and which still characterizes the city in its renovated state: for although the Government has endeavoured to superintend the erection of the new buildings, so as to preserve greater regularity in the streets, and has laid out public marketplaces, and new promenades around the high walls and upon the elevated bulwarks of the ancient Kremlin, and removed much that was formerly offensive to the inhabitants, yet the ancient characteristics of this extraordinary metropolis, both in the city and in the suburbs, still remain, and continue to surprise every stranger who visits it. Certainly, when viewed at day-break from the Sparrow Mount, the extent of its limits, the number and conspicuousness of its elegant churches, with their towering domes and gilded spires topped with brilliant crosses (many of them placed in the centre of the Mahomedan crescent), the intermixture of gardens, palaces, and other edifices whose roofs are covered with plate-iron and painted with gay colours, upon which the morning sun casts his golden rays—all these present a scene at once unique and captivating, and I think only to be equalled by the view of Constantinople and the shores of the Bosphorus.

The population, though fast increasing, cannot be considered much to exceed 250,000 in winter; and it is considerably less in summer, when the nobility and their numerous attendants retire to their country-seats. The present metropolitan, Philaret, informed me, in 1822, that in the city of Moscow there were then 240 churches used. In 1830, the number of churches in use is stated to be 263; with about 20 convents, 50 hospitals, 30 public baths, and 260 manufactories. The marks of the conflagration are still prominent in the German quarter, called the Nemetskoy Sloboda, where, comparatively, few houses have been rebuilt: and in other parts within the circle of the ancient city are found many extensive spaces empty, which formerly were oc-The walls of the Kremlin, with cupied with buildings. its interior edifices, are nearly all restored. I was much interested in viewing upwards of 800 pieces of cannon, taken from the French in 1812, lying, in rows, upon the ground in front of the arsenal in the Kremlin, classified according to the nations to which they originally belonged; and which are intended for a monument, to commemorate their deliverance from the twelve invading nations whom Napoleon led against them.

I spent three days in visiting my friends among the nobility and clergy of Moscow; by whom I was most kindly welcomed, after my long absence. The metropolitan, Seraphim, who now presides over the see of Petersburg and Novogorod, was particularly glad to see me, and to inquire after the state of the poor Greeks. I found the Moscow Bible Society actively prosecuting the object of its association. During the year, they had sold out of the depôt, 727 Bibles and 2272 Testaments; and they had sent 1738 Bibles and 3445 Testaments into the provinces. They had printed within the year 5000 Slavonian Bibles in quarto, and 5000 Polish Testaments; and had lately undertaken to print 7000 Polish Bibles of the Catholic Version, and 2000 Slavonian Bibles, both There have been many satisfactory proofs in octavo. of the good produced by the labours of the Society; and many affecting instances of the avidity with which those of the lower ranks, who can read, seek for and peruse the word of God.

Having lived in Moscow the greater part of the years 1810 and 1811, and left that city only forty-eight hours before the French entered it in 1812—and having visited it frequently for several weeks at a time since its conflagration, and at all times had an uninterrupted intercourse with the nobles and other ranks of the inhabitants—I shall here lay before my readers such observations as I have made, at different periods, on the character, privileges, and manners of the Russian nobility; and upon the laws, courts of justice, &c.

Peter the Great laid a stable foundation for those mighty changes which have taken place, within the last century, in every department of political and domestic economy in Russia. It is since his time that the Russian nobles have pulled down the humble wooden mansions in which their forefathers used to reside, and have erected, in their stead, splendid palaces, richly furnished, and surrounded with extensive pleasure-grounds, gardens, and green-Until the beginning of the last century, the houses of the nobility, their furniture, kitchen utensils, cookery, the service of their tables, dress of their domestics, &c. &c. were all in unison with the condition of the nation at large, and with the ancient manners and customs of its princes and nobles, from time immemorial. But what a contrast between these humble dwellings, and the present stately palaces which strike the view of the traveller in almost every part of European Russia, which, in point of magnitude and beauty of architecture, come nearer to the country-houses of our English nobility, than the seats of the nobles in any other country in Europe! The humble huts of the fishermen on the banks of the Neva, when first visited by the creative genius of Peter in 1703, contrasted with the present city of palaces which occupies their place, can alone afford a proper conception of the change. But such was the general attachment of the Russian boiars and nobles to their long beards, flowing robes, and Asiatic costume, that Peter, with all the plenitude of autocratic power, and the resources of a great mind, was able to make but very partial inroads upon them. The example of the Tzar was sufficient to prevail upon the interested courtiers around him to comply with his wishes in these matters of dress; but in 1699, a ukaz was found necessary to urge the nobles in the provinces to conform; and after six years' unsuccessful efforts to produce this change, he was obliged to issue another ukaz, by which those, who would not conform, were compelled to purchase the privilege of suffering the hair to grow upon their From these rather severe measures the clergy and peasantry were exempted.

his predilection for extremes, that, in the present age, the rage for European languages, manners, and fashions, and an antipathy to every thing that is truly Russian, seems to have no bounds. "It was not wise in that great man," as Philaret has well observed, "to excite disaffection in the minds of his subjects towards the customs and habits of their ancestors; because this was to destroy the national character, and to break down one of the greatest bulwarks of the state." And though it must be acknowledged that wonderful changes have been produced, and that the energies of the people have been drawn forth to the astonishment, and even terror, of the nations of Western Europe, yet so rapid has been the growth of civilization throughout this mighty hot-house, where plants of a less genial clime have been forced into flower, as if to imitate the native beauties of warmer regions, that, on almost every side, one observes marks of the superficial nature of the whole process. civilization is a gradual advance of the minds and manners of a people, from a state of ignorance and indolence, to a state of knowledge and industry, in all their various ramifications. It is inconsistent with the very nature of this change to suppose that legislative enactments, however wise, or the efforts of the civil power, however energetic, should of themselves be able to produce it; nay, I will even venture to hazard the assertion, that it is impossible for one class of subjects to be truly civilized, while another is left in slavery and ignorance. Nor can such a general transformation be the work of a single age, any more than an acorn can be forced into an oak in the space of a few years: moreover, if the change is to be thorough and universal, its foundation must be laid in just and equal laws for all, in personal freedom, security of property, liberty of conscience, and institutions for the gradual cultivation of all ranks. We see in Russia, that, where one class is civilized while the great mass of the middle and lower classes are left in ignorance, even the civilization of the few is, at best, but partial, unsatisfactory, and destitute of that harmony which ought to pervade the whole. The dwellings, dress, equipage, manners, language, and learning of the nobility of Russia have, it is true, undergone a complete change, in many respects for the better: but one yet finds a too prevalent deficiency of harmonious and uniform mental refinement in the higher classes, and a total want of correspondent culture in the various ranks of people below them—an absence of order and consistency in the whole social picture. Nor can this ever be remedied, until the lower orders are made free, and educated and raised in the scale of society; and until changes take place in Russia, which are reasonably expected, and which, in the progress of society, are steadily making their approach. Nevertheless, let us admire the advances which civilization has already made in this vast empire; and let us do justice to the talents and sacrifices by which it has been promoted.

It has often appeared to me a great error in foreigners, that they judge the Russians by the scale of culture and civilization found in other European nations; and an equal error in the civilized class in Russia, when they demand, perhaps not unfrequently out of vanity, to be tried according to this standard. As soon might the inexperienced youth of twenty lay claim to the maturity of wisdom which belongs to the philosopher of threescore, as Russia, in justice, be put into the scale with England, France, or Germany. But is it therefore derogatory to the youth of twenty, that he is not as wise as his sire, provided he have knowledge and experience propor-

Russians, that they are still so low in the scale of civilized nations. They are fast rising; and have shewn such vigour and application in youth, as to promise great things in mature years. They are capable of rivalling in talent, and in the arts and sciences, the most distinguished nations, whether of ancient or modern times.

The Russians are a lively people, but not frivolous; happy in their natural temperament, and not easily depressed in their spirits. The better classes have, with great advantage, adopted the polish of European manners. The ladies are handsome—some of them beautiful; polite, affable, and social; and, by their accomplishments and wit, assiduously yet gracefully exert themselves to diffuse happiness in their evening circles. The tone of hospitality and politeness, so characteristic of the better circles in Russia, surprises the stranger; and the fraternal ease and familiarity, expressed in their language and intercourse with each other, strongly evince their kindness of disposition. In the lower ranks of the nobles, where this ease is imitated without refinement, it often degenerates into vulgarity and rudeness. As a people, they are true to their national proverb—" Tschin tschina potschitai i menschai sadis na krai," "Let rank obey rank, and the least sit lowest." This, not unfrequently, produces obsequiousness in the presence of superiors, and imperiousness towards inferiors.

All classes of the nobles are too fond of the idle and corrupting pursuits, to which men of fortune and pleasure in other European countries are addicted—plays, balls, masquerades, parties of pleasure, and gambling; for they take little pleasure in useful employment; and to judge from their acts, one would believe that many of them consider life granted for no other purpose than the giving and receiving of entertainments. There are, however, many honourable exceptions to these general observations—nobles, who are the very reverse of what is here censured, with some of whom I have had the honour of an intimate acquaintance, and in some instances of sincere friendship; men of character, talent, activity, and refined gentlemanly manners. But in many of the Russian nobility the predilection for superficial ornament and display, so characteristic of their Gallican instructors, is very observable. In this respect, the pupils seem to have imbibed the very sentiments and feelings, and too much of the frivolity of their tutors; and hence we frequently find comfort and sobriety sacrificed to grandeur and ostentation in the families of the higher ranks. It may truly be said of many of the boiars, that they have, in one trait of their character, Roman minds; for their mansions, number of domestics, pleasure-gardens, churches, equipages, and public buildings, all bear the marks of grand conception: but, then, they too frequently bear also the marks of a want of due calculation between plans and means. The general feature of the national Government, and of the character of the nobles, indicates an aspiring mind a mind that will be great, and is bent upon doing great things. Their progress in this career, during the last century, has been truly astonishing; and we need no stronger proof that there is something essentially noble and great in the Russian people, than the volumes of contradictory estimates which are daily given to the public, respecting their character and natural abilities. Had these been so despicable as some have represented them to be, the contest would long ago have been settled: had they been so superlative as others would have the public believe, their deeds would have made this more manifest. Their sterling natural abilities, their form of government, their rapid strides from barbarism to civilization, their youthful vigour as a nation, and their daily augmenting political and commercial influence, sufficiently account for all these contradictory statements.

The nobility speak French with fluency and elegance of accent; and the variety of sounds in their native tongue enables them to pronounce the English language also with ease: the latter is now very generally studied among them.—The tables of the nobility, on ordinary occasions, are richly supplied with wholesome viands and pastry in the French style; yet they are now and then set off with national dishes, many of which are well prepared, and not likely soon to lose their place, even at the tables of the great. Foreign wines are served up in great variety, together with the native drinks—a superior kind of effervescent quass, called kisla tschee; mead, nalivki, (liquors made of the juice of fruits): they have also varanie, preserves, &c. &c. In general, they are temperate, both in eating and drinking. -Adultery, unchastity, gambling, and other vices, are, alas! but too prevalent among them. The sins of drunkenness and swearing are become unfashionable among the nobles of Russia, as well as among those of England. Oh that they were so among the lower classes of both countries also!—Many of the nobility spend a large part of their property and of their time, in the winter season, in Moscow, in balls, feasts, and parties of pleasure: in these they endeavour to outshine each other-much to the astonishment of strangers from the more civilized countries of Western Europe, where the influence of equal liberty, the more general diffusion of property, the progress of science and of the arts, and a matured state of society, have long since put it out of the power of the higher classes, with very few exceptions, to give such displays of Oriental and Roman magnificence and luxury. But these, and other characteristics of the state of society in Moscow, which strike the eye of the traveller, have been abundantly described by other writers, and therefore I shall not enlarge upon them. I cannot, however, but add this general observation, that even now, notwithstanding her recent severe chastisement, Moscow is a city devoted to sensuality, luxury, and worldly pleasure, in their thousand captivating and destructive forms.

In 1785, Catherine II., by a ukaz, ordained that the nobility should be divided into six classes, according to their seniority; and that they should, in each Government, compose one corporate body, under the direction of their own marshal, counsellors, judges, and officers, chosen from among and by themselves, once every three years; possessing also their own archives, seal, secretary, and treasurer. These six classes are as follows:—

- 1. Such as can prove their nobility for more than one hundred years—styled stolbovoe dvoriane (pillar nobility).
- 2. Military nobles—those who, though not descended of noble families, have, by military service, obtained the rank of nobility for themselves and their posterity, according to the regulations of Peter I. in 1721.
- 3. The eighth class of nobility, or such as have, in the civil service, risen to the eighth degree. They are considered equal to the first class in precedency.
- 4. Foreign noble families, who have settled in Russia, and entered the service of Government.
 - 5. Russian princes, counts, and barons.
 - 6. The most ancient class of the nobility; or such as can trace back the antiquity of their families for centuries, though the commencement of it be unknown to them.

The whole number of male and female nobility included in these six classes is estimated, in the present day, at 450,000: and they are daily augmenting; because no one who possesses merit, whether he be native or foreigner, and whatever religion he may profess, is excluded from treading the path to distinction, nobility, and honour; except the bond slaves, who, whatever their talents may be, cannot rise in the scale of society, until they are emancipated.

The nobility of Russia may well be styled "a privileged order." Their charter of rights was confirmed to them by Peter the Great, in 1721: it was revised and enlarged by Catherine II. in 1785; and was again confirmed in 1801, by the late emperor, Alexander. rights are principally the following:—The provincial body of nobles, when assembled, has the right of making representations to the legislative senate, and to the emperor, by deputation. They have the power of expelling from their society such members as have committed offences, before they are tried by the civil courts. Every nobleman of age has the right of entry to their assemblies; but unless he be possessed of landed property, and has risen to the rank of an officer, he cannot vote. The husband communicates his rank to his wife and children, but not reciprocally. The nobility are exempt from every kind of taxes. They can be judged only by their peers: they cannot be condemned till tried: they are exempt from corporal punishment: in case of trial for capital crimes, the case must be finally judged by the senate, or by the emperor himself, who alone has the right to deprive the individual of his nobility, estates, and life.

The nobleman has a right to purchase lands and peasantry in his own name, and to govern them as he judges proper. On his estates he may erect manufactories, and dispose of their produce in or out of the empire: he may likewise establish fairs and markets on his estates. But in case he erect a manufactory in a town, he must pay the taxes for it, on the same scale with the merchant.

The nobleman enjoys unlimited power over his own property: to him belongs every thing on his grounds, on the surface and in the bowels of the earth, in the waters, and in the forests. His peasantry, with all they possess, are, in every sense of the term, his property.

The nobleman may become a merchant, without losing his nobility; but in this case he must bear the usual burthens of the merchant.

The nobleman is free to enter the military or civil service of his country, and to take his discharge when he pleases.

Nobility, as has been shewn, is obtained by birth, by the rank of an officer in the army, and by the eighth degree of rank in the civil service: it is also conferred by the emperor on whomsoever he will. The great majority of the nobility enter the military and civil service in early life; because precedency is not counted according to the hereditary rank of nobility, but according to the personal rank to which the individual has risen in the service of his country; and hence one frequently sees the son of a commoner taking his place above princes and counts of the empire, who have not attained to the same degree of rank by their personal service.

The civilization hitherto diffused among the nobility of Russia has been principally derived from two nations:

manners, fashions, polite literature, and amusements, have been taken from the French, whose language is that of all the family circles and public parties of the first ranks; but solid learning, and the knowledge of the arts and sciences, have been communicated to them by the Germans, many of whose supernumerary literati, ever since the time of Alexie Michaelovitch, have found honourable and most useful employment in Russia. The universities, gymnasiums, schools, academies of science and arts, and, in short, almost every thing connected with philosophy and learning in Russia, except the spiritual schools, have been established and superintended by learned Germans in the service of Government. Even at the present day, these foreigners still occupy many of the principal chairs in the six universities of the empire, and in other places of education: to them, also, the Russians are principally indebted for the best dictionaries and grammars of their own language; together with such courses of the arts, sciences, and literature, as continue to be taught in the universities and schools. In this choice the Government has, I think, shewn great judgment; because, of all European nations, the Germans, on account of the extent and solidity of their learning, and the indefatigable steady perseverance of their character, were best qualified for the task of introducing the arts and sciences among the Russians. Other foreigners, also, have had a share in this laudable work of civilization, but it has been comparatively small;—the Italians assisting in architecture, brass-foundries, and music; and the English in ship-building and other naval arts, in iron-foundries, manufactories, medicine, horticulture, and agriculture.

The German language is studied by the nobles and literary characters in Russia, but it is seldom spoken in polite circles; there the language, manners, amusements, dress, and luxuries of Paris still predominate: on this account the education of the children of the nobility, especially since the commencement of the French Revolution, which drove so many of their nobles and ecclesiastics to take refuge in foreign countries, has been principally in the hands of French tutors and governesses. But since the French invasion in 1812, there seems to be springing up, among the learned native Russians, a patriotic spirit in favour of the cultivation of their own language and literature, in preference to that of strangers, and a desire to fill all the offices of public and private instruction with native tutors. This, to a certain extent, is much to be commended; because it will encourage education, will elicit the latent talents of the natives, will be the means of settling and improving their language, and will counteract that absorbing attachment to foreign usages, languages, and productions of every kind, which is not less opposed to their progress in true science than in all the arts of civilized life*.

These circumstances have drawn forth that which has been considered in the Russians as a peculiar gift, viz. their extraordinary talent for imitation; but which, in ^{*}Such is the strength of this disposition in the Russians to depreciate every thing which issues from their own manufactories or workshops, that it is a common practice among the merchants to ascribe a foreign origin to their wares of all kinds: for as soon as they declare them to be of Russian workmanship, they are despised; whereas, if they give them out for English or German, they are sure to obtain a fairer price for them. It is also true, that, in general, foreign artificers work better than the natives; but then the principal reason of this superiority lies in the high price given to the former (whose workmen, after all, are Russians), and the want of this encouragement to the latter, even when they do excel.

my opinion, is nothing more than what was naturally to be expected from a people with good natural abilities, circumstanced as they have been. When the civilized world was laid open to them, and the acquisition of the French, German, and English languages introduced the Russian students into the temple of the arts and sciences of the eighteenth century, they soon found they had every thing to learn: they beheld models placed before them in every department of knowledge; models, which they must first be content to imitate, before they could think of improving upon them. It is the general rule, that the scholar imitates, the master invents; and this is applicable to the exercise of talent in nations as well as individuals. New inventions in the arts, and useful discoveries in the sciences, generally proceed from nations that have cultivated both through many successive ages, and where the body of the people have been educated, by which the door is opened to the exercise of talent in all classes. It is painful to be obliged to state, however, that where remarkable instances of a talent for imitation have appeared among the lower classes of the Russians, the individuals have generally, sooner or later, fallen into drunkenness, and have lived and died in misery: probably their total want of moral cultivation, of polished society, and of freedom, have driven some of them to this; for the faculty of imitation does not confer upon its possessor culture, either moral or religious, nor does it secure him from seeking gratification in the lowest vices. Few instances can be shewn in which mere genius has raised a Russian peasant to honour and opulence: but how frequently is this the case in other countries, where the people are free!

In Russia, however, as has been stated, education is still confined within very narrow limits; and those who have received it, have still found, that before they can excel in any department, they have to accomplish the arduous task of overtaking those who have preceded There are, in fact, but few native authors distinguished for deep research or discovery in the sciences and arts. The only exception, perhaps, is in poetry; because to excel in this is not so much the result of deep study as of innate genius, which has often shewn itself in its greatest perfection where learning was in its infancy. Some eminent poets have sprung up among the Russians; such as, Derjavin, Lomonosoff, Soumarokoff, Dmitrieff, Labanoff, Ismailoff, Kriloff, Kozloff, Ioukofsky, and others; but principally since the beginning of the last century.—From the same causes it also happens, that four fifths of the books printed in Russ are translations from the different languages of Europe, especially from the French, German, and English. There is no want of works, in every branch of knowledge, in the native dialect. I have a catalogue, printed in 1820, and systematically arranged, of the library of Plaviltschikoff, one of the principal Russian booksellers of Petersburg, which contains 7657 works of different sizes, all in Russ. The libraries of the great are chiefly filled with works in French and other foreign languages; and it is the practice of the Russian censors strictly to examine all works imported, and to suppress or mutilate such of them as contain matter obnoxious to the supposed interests of Government. Sometimes foreigners of respectability, who are desirous of possessing, for their own personal studies, any prohibited work, are permitted to import a copy, on giving a written declaration that they will make no improper use of it. This permission, however, is only granted by mere favour, and is not so common of late years as formerly. Within the last few years, indeed, the regulations of the censorship have become very strict, in every department of literature, whether moral, political, scientific, or religious: no work whatever is suffered to go to press until severely scrutinized by the censors, and few pass without being mutilated and altered in many passages.

At the present day, the following periodical works are published in the two capitals. In Moscow—1. The Moscow Gazette. 2. The Moscow Courier. 3. The Telegraph. 4. The European Courier. 5. The Agricultural Journal; and, 6. The Journal of Physics. In St. Petersburg—1. The St. Petersburg Gazette. 2. The Gazette of the Senate. 3. The Journal of Commerce. 4. The St. Petersburg Journal. 5. The Invalid. 6. The Northern Bee. 7. The Archives of the North. 8. The Patriot. 9. The Slavonians. 10. The National Miscellany. 11. The Journal of Commerce and Manufactories. 12. The Gazette of Commerce. 13. The Journal of the Mines; and, 14. The Journal of the Minister for Public Instruction.

One great hindrance to the progress of learning in Russia has been the regulation of Peter the Great respecting military rank. Whatever may be a man's talents and learning, without rank he is little thought of, and has little influence. Without rank a man is nothing in Russia: hence most of the sons of the nobility are enrolled in active service before they reach their eighteenth or twentieth year; for unless they enter early in life, they can have no prospect whatever of rising to distinguished rank before old age. Thus are their studies broken off, at the very time when the human mind begins to move independently of its tutors, and to teach itself. Nor can this great evil be remedied, until learning, talents, moral worth, &c. shall give that precedency and influence in society which are now conferred by military and civil rank; and until men be allowed to devote their lives to private study, without forfeiting thereby every prospect of attaining to influence and consideration among their fellow-men.

Men's characters are formed by their education, and by the circumstances in which they are placed: and where a nation is distinguished by civil freedom, and a steady government according to equitable laws, combined with genuine Christian principle and general knowledge, the characteristics of the people will be more or less in harmony with these advantages; they will be found candid in their statements, honourable in their transactions, polite in their manners, and humane in their treatment of enemies. But the history of all nations teaches, that where despotism, oppression, intrigue, and injustice, either sit upon or surround the throne, and occupy the seats of rule in all offices below it, the character of the people is equally moulded according to these evil qualities: cunning and deception take the place of candour and justice; haughtiness and meanness are found to exist in the same individual, according to circumstances; and the man who has often suffered unjust and cruel treatment at the hand of others, becomes unjust and cruel in his turn. Nothing but vital Christian principle will enable a man to return good for If this, then, be a just view of human nature, we are not to look for high principles of honour where rational freedom is not enjoyed, where national laws and institutions do not guarantee equal justice to all, where despotic power descends from the throne to every one who occupies a place below it, and where the weight of oppression, under which the injured suffer, is too often augmented by the very attempt to obtain redress.

Many of the darker shades in the character of the lower orders in Russia are such as might naturally be expected from the disadvantageous circumstances in which they are placed. To expect from an ignorant slave the deportment and the conduct of a freeman, is to look for figs from thorns and grapes of thistles. Slavery cuts the nerves of industry, and paralyses every noble feeling. The slave cannot even think like a man born free: his unnatural bondage is interwoven with his earliest associations, of which he can never divest himself so long as he remains in ignorance and a slave.

Catherine II. was once asked, by a lady, what she thought of the Russian character and natural abilities. Her majesty replied: "The Russian people are the most singular people in the world."—" What does this mean, your majesty?" said the lady: "has not God made all nations of the same materials?" "The Russian people," continued Catherine, "are distinguished for shrewdness, sense, and energy. I know this from twenty years experience in reigning over them. God has given to the Russians peculiar abilities." In this short estimate of Russian character I find great truth. They are the most shrewd and cunning people I have ever had to do with; neither Jew nor Greek is capable of outwitting them. Neither do these qualities shew themselves merely in the cultivated classes of society; they are equally prominent in the bearded peasant as in the polished prince. There is no language, with which I am acquainted, that has such a variety of most expressive terms for circumvention and cunning as the Russ; and on no occasion is it more indispensable for a man to be upon his guard against being taken in, than in going to the Moscow or Petersburg bazaars. The general principles on which the merchants in the riadi or bazaar act is this—"The article is worth what it will bring:" hence, according to the idea which they, at first sight, form of the character of the purchaser and his probable knowledge of the value of the thing asked for, they demand not only double, but three and four times what it is worth, confirming their statements with imprecations and oaths: and, after all, they will think nothing of letting you have the article for one half or one third of the sum which they asked and swore to! And yet, many of these men would not, for the world, leave their families in the morning without first crossing and prostrating themselves and repeating their prayers before their sacred picture, and many of them will not open their shop-doors until they have first bought a few small loaves of bread and divided them among the poor! I remember to have once reasoned with a merchant on the sin and folly of such a practice. I represented to him, that the gains he took home in the evening were the fruits of false oaths and innumerable lies; and urged, how horrible it was to think that his wife and children were supported at the expense of such an accumulation of sin upon his own head. He heard me silently; and then, with a smile, replied: "Sir, you seem to have been reading sacred history."—But I must also observe, that there are shops in both capitals, where, if you are one of their regular customers, they state to you at once the real price of the article.

As to the second quality mentioned by the Empress, "sense"—her observation is equally correct. They are certainly, for the most part, gifted with a sound judgment. Their language is enriched with stores of national proverbs, containing concise summaries of wisdom applicable to almost every affair within the circle of their knowledge and experience; and these proverbs, forming a perpetual light for them to walk by, are continually in the mouths of the people. In their observation of the conduct of men, as well as of the appearances of nature, they manifest deep penetration and a correct judgment. They are quick of apprehension, even of abstract ideas: and the degree of ingenuity manifested by the peasant, in the performance of his usual labours, is truly astonishing; he is a complete artisan, practised in all trades, his fruitful invention seldom leaving him without an expedient, in cases of difficulty.

They are also distinguished for energy of character, and are patient and persevering in the prosecution of their object. The Russian soldier is cool in the hour of danger: he will endure hunger and thirst, the extremes of heat and cold, and every possible privation in a campaign, without murmuring; and in the day of battle, he is not only brave, but regardless and almost prodigal of life, devoting it at the command of his superior, without inquiring for a moment the reason or the object of the sacrifice.

In the government of Varonge, two brothers were presented for the militia; one twenty-three years of age, the other fifteen. The elder was chosen: the younger, much grieved at this, entreated to be accepted instead of his elder brother, saying, "Notwithstanding my youth, my brother is witness that I have often overcome him, and the other young men of the village, in wrestling." The elder brother confirmed what he had said. "See," continued the younger, "I have spoken the truth: my brother, too, is married and has children: our mother is aged, and requires our help; yea, she gave us her blessing, on our taking leave for the service of the emperor." "No, no," cried the elder, "she gave me her blessing. You shall take care of our mother, and of my wife and children, and I will go and serve the Tzar." During the whole of the examination the younger never left his elder brother; and when he saw him enrolled, he took his leave, saying, "If they kill thee, I also will go against the enemy, and will be avenged for thee, or fall by thy side."

The Russians are a truly loyal people: not only has this been historically proved, but it manifests itself in a striking way to strangers among them, on innumerable occasions. In their current conversation, the dictates of religion and the edicts of the Tzar seem to be considered by them as proceeding from the same source. Implicit obedience to God to and the Emperor is deemed one and the same thing among the Russian people. During the time of the French invasion we had many extraordinary proofs of genuine patriotism and loyalty. In one of the villages where they were enrolling volunteers en masse, a peasant of fifty-eight came forward with his three married sons, and, presenting them, said, "We are all able and ready to serve God and our great sovereign: if one of us only is wanted, pray enrol me: my sons have cared for all my wants, I shall be happy to take their place." Being informed that he could not be accepted on account of his age, he exclaimed bitterly-"Oh old age! old age! why didst thou not linger behind ten years longer?" He was then asked to make choice of one of his sons to serve. He chose the middle-aged one, a tall healthy youth:

then taking off the cross from his own neck, he put it on the neck of his son, and with a steady voice said: "Receive my blessing. Serve, faithfully and truly, God and thy Sovereign. I have worn this cross fifty-eight years: it has protected me from all dangers: may it also protect thee from evil and from the enemy! And if it be the will of the Creator of Heaven that thou shouldst lay down thy life in the field of battle, then look on this cross in thy last moments, and remember thy brethren remember me! Go; and may God go with thee!" He then blessed him a second time, clasped him in his arms, kissed him, and they separated.

On another occasion, when the aid of the disbanded military was required in the government of Vorosge, a fresh-looking veteran presented himself; and, taking out of his bosom a small wooden case, and giving it to the officer, requested him to examine its contents:—it contained the testimonials of his service, according to which he proved to be in his ninety-third year. He was considered incapable of service; but in order not to hurt his feelings, the officer told him his petition would be attended to. The next day, on hearing that he had been rejected, he came to the officer; and holding the resolution in his hand, said, "Your Honour! it is evident that there is little truth left among you—you do not fear God. You told me that I was received into the service; but in this ukaz it is written, 'Liberated on account of age!' Consider-I need not to learn the service. Under the Empress Elizabeth, of blessed memory, we marched into Austria, suffering day and night from heat and thirst, and it never entered our heads to think of getting our discharge. Only let us old men get into the field of battle, we shall not flinch; we will lead on the youth! When our fathers gave us their blessing, at entering the service, they said, 'Serve faithfully, to the boards of your coffin, God and the emperor.'

It was the custom of the Tzars, after war, to pay their respects to the memory of Holy Sergie, whose relics, deposited in the great monastery which bears his name in Troitza, are considered to have the power of working miracles. The Emperor Alexander undertook this duty, on the 22d of August, O.S. 1817. While he was performing his devotions at the shrine, a great multitude of the peasantry assembled around his equipage; and they were heard to say, "Now God will surely give us His blessing, for the emperor himself is praying for us!" At the same time, observing that the sides and wheels of his carriage were exceedingly bespattered from the dirt of the roads, one of them proposed to clean it: no sooner was the hint given, than they threw off their upper garments, flew for water, and soon restored to the carriage of the emperor its original colour and cleanness. This gives us a fine instance of the devotion and filial affection of the Russian mujiks for their sovereign.

The Russian character is also marked by a strong sense of religion, though united, through ignorance, with much superstition. Such of the people as can read are exceedingly attached to the Scriptures and other religious books; and I know not to what other cause than to a zeal for God, (not indeed according to knowledge,) we can attribute the great variety of sects found among them, some of which are far more superstitious than the Mother Church. Their religion and their language are the two bonds of union, which bid fair to preserve the Russians, for ages to come, a united and powerful people: for whatever changes may take place in their internal political state, or may be brought about by the progress of civilization and knowledge, yet such is the gnevitsa"—"God will give to thee: be not angry." The nobles and merchants give large sums, annually, in support of alms-houses and hospitals, for the relief of orphans and families in distress, and especially to relieve debtors from prison. To this cause, principally, it is to be attributed, that, in all the prisons I have visited in Russia, so very few debtors were to be found. It was from this principle, also, that we received such large sums from the native Russians, in support of the Bible Society, Philanthropic Society, Prison Society, &c. On all principal holidays, moreover, the merchants send large supplies of provisions, without discrimination, to the inmates of the several prisons.

It is astonishing what sums are given away at the conclusion of divine service to the poor who crowd the portals of their temples! This again is a strong evidence of the fraternal spirit which binds together this powerful Slavonic tribe among themselves: they seldom forget that every "Ruskoe Tschelovek," every Russian man, poor or rich, is a brother; and in the hour of distress their hand is extended for his relief.

Often are the orphan children of deceased foreigners, English, French, or German, divided among the charitable families of the nobles, educated with their own children, and thus introduced into life with advantages far superior to what they would probably have enjoyed, had the lives of their parents been spared.

It is not to be supposed that the Russians were in possession of historical records and written laws before the erection of the monarchy, or even before the introduction of Christianity: but they were, no doubt, then governed by their own peculiar usages; which, though not contained in folio tomes, were nevertheless nationally acknowledged, and formed the bands of that political union which the Slavonian conqueror, Rurik, established among them, in 862: to these he probably added many of the laws and usages of the conquerors. In 912, the Grand-duke Oleg, and in 945 the Grand-duke Igor, entered into treaties with the Greek Emperors; in which treaties, says Urspenskoy, frequent mention is made of the laws or usages of the Russians. He specifies, by way of example, the following particulars. 1. The sanctity of an oath was acknowledged. 2. The punishment of death was awarded for murder. 3. The wife inherited part of the property of her husband. 4. The wife did not suffer for the offences of her husband. maining, the punishment was not member for member, but a fine. 6. For stealing, a two-fold or three-fold restitution, according to the circumstances of the case, was enjoined. 7. The life of a thief caught in the act of stealing might be taken, provided there were no means of securing him. 8. The property of a foreigner deceased was to be transmitted to his own country and relations.

How far the Christianity of the Greeks was instrumental in producing these and some other acknowledgments of the natural rights of man, among their heathen Russian neighbours, it is impossible to say; but thus much is known, that the Christian religion had entered among the Russians, partially and by degrees, a hundred years before it was publicly confessed by Vladimir and his subjects; and it is more than probable that the opinions and usages of the people must have been already influenced by those principles of justice, which that religion so powerfully and simply inculcates upon all its professors.

One of the laws of Vladimir exhibits a considerable maturity of political and commercial knowledge.

By this law, foreign merchants are forbidden to travel in his dominions for the purpose of buying and selling among the people and nobles; they are permitted to trade with the Russian merchants in the towns only.

In the year 1035, the Grand-duke Jaroslaff, son of Vladimir, collected together all the acknowledged laws and usages of the tribes under his government, whether of Russian or Slavonian origin; and this collection formed the basis of what is called the Ruskoi Prava, or "Russian Rights," first printed in 1799. These have been abrogated, modified, and augmented in number, &c. &c., according to the circumstances of the times, the necessities of the people, and the will of the reigning Sovereign, from the days of Jaroslaff to the present time.

But the division of the empire into principalities, by this first Russian Legislator, among his five sons, gave rise to many separate laws and usages in the different states; and the Tartars soon after subduing them, and ruling for nearly three centuries, introduced so many Mohammedan maxims and laws into the Russian legislation, that it became a matter of great difficulty for Tzar Ioan Vasillivitch Grosnoi, after their emancipation, to produce some degree of uniformity in this code of justice. For this end, he had recourse to an old copy of the Code of Jaroslaff; which, with the assistance and benediction of the clergy, was revised, and again proclaimed on the 1st of May 1550, under the title of Sudebnik, "The Code of Justice." This contained the general laws of the state; and though a very imperfect system of polity, it was deemed superior to that of Jaroslaff. To these Tzar Ioan added a system of Criminal Law. under the title of Gubnich Grammat, which was long supposed to be lost; but it has been discovered and published, by Eugenius, the present archbishop of Pleskoff.

The Russian code of Sudebnik consists of ninety-seven chapters. A great part of the laws contained in it are directed against bribery, as practised towards judges and administrators of justice. They require, among other things, that the complainant shall, in every case, pay the expenses, in whatever way the cause may be decided; whether by regular course of law, by arbitration, or by duel.

These trials by duel are particularly described, from the ninth to the nineteenth chapter. The weapons to be used were cudgels. None were permitted to fight but freemen; and such as were themselves unable, might choose a substitute. The judges and officers were commanded to be present, in order to preserve order, and to see the contest lawfully decided.

The term for trying cases of disputed claims to estates was limited to three years; but where the interest of the Tzar might be involved, to six years. On the subject of inheritance there is but one law; viz. that in case a father die without making his will, and he have no sons, then his daughters, and after them the next in relationship, shall inherit all his property.

In every case of bargain, a guarantee was requisite. Horses were to be paid for on their being sold, and the tax to Government at the time of registration.*

The Sudebnik defines also the different degrees of slavery, and the way in which a freeman might be reduced to temporary or perpetual bondage; which we have before described.

The same Grand-duke, Ioan Vasillivitch IV., by a ukaz, made it death for any person to attempt to deprive a freeman of his liberty, by forging a kabala or deed—

a singular proof of the value which was still placed on personal freedom, even in his time! Yet so inconsistent and changeable are the laws of despotic princes, that while, by one ukaz, he made it death to attempt to deprive a man of his personal liberty, by another he ordered the free peasantry to be restored to the landlords whom they had left five years before, in order thereby to put a final stop to their freedom of migration; and the consequence of this, and of similar restrictions made by his predecessors and successors, was, as we have already shewn, the reduction of this numerous class of freemen, the peasantry and their posterity, to unlimited and absolute slavery.

Nearly at the same time, Ioan promulgated an ecclesiastical code, called the Stroglovnik, in 100 chapters.

The father of Peter the Great, Alexie Michaelovitch, finding the existing laws inadequate to the changed circumstances of the nation, collected, revised, and enlarged them: this revision he published in 1649, under the name of Sobornae Ulojenie, "The Assembled Code." Among the new edicts inserted in the Code of Alexie, there are several of a most singular nature: for instance (chap. xxi. par. 71), in addition to the punishment of death for murder, the debts of the person killed are commanded to be paid out of the estates or property of the murderer. The debts of foreigners (chap. x. par. 260) are to be paid first, and afterwards the Russians are permitted to come in with their claims. No doubt the design of this latter enactment was to encourage foreigners to settle in his dominions, and to preserve the good name of his merchants in foreign parts; but it was certainly at variance with the strict principles of equity.

The liberal use of torture, in the examination of all accused persons, was sanctioned by this code and its commentator: this is justly condemned by the Russian historian, Boltin, as cruel and unjust. Moreover, such was its severity, that even a confession of the crime, of which the person was accused, was not deemed sufficient: when this was obtained; the torture was continued, with a view to extort the confession of other offences previously committed. But the scene of all this secret inquisition and cruelty has undergone a blessed change: it is the house in which I am now lodged: I still behold in its walls the niches where so many of my fellow-creatures were confined;—and this star-chamber of Moscow is now the depôt of the Moscow Bible Society!

In this code, for the murder of a son or daughter nothing more is awarded than such penance as the clergy might appoint, and imprisonment for one year; but those who should take snuff, or sell or have in their possession tobacco, are condemned to be knouted, to have their nostrils torn open, or their noses cut off, and to be sent into exile! A ukaz to this effect was issued even so late as 1634.—Thus slow has been the progress of justice, humanity, and civilization in Russia, even under the immediate predecessor of her great reformer, Peter I.!

In 1652-3 was published the Kormshia kniga, or Collection of the Canon Law of the Greek Church, translated, as some suppose, from the Greek; but it is supposed by Tatischeff to be the work of the Patriarch Nikon. Though this book chiefly refers to ecclesiastical matters, yet these and the state affairs were so much blended together in the days of the Tzars, that it is frequently quoted even in their civil edicts.

It is remarkable, that the ancient Russian legislators required seven witnesses of their own nation to prove an accusation; and only two, provided the witnesses were foreigners! Nor is this merely another instance of the condescension and kindness of their rulers towards foreigners, in order to induce them to settle in their dominions; it involves, perhaps, a tacit acknowledgment that they were actuated by stricter principles of moral rectitude than themselves. This latter supposition alone can account for the seeming injustice of this law.

Trials by red-hot iron, and by boiling water, were formerly in great use among the Russians, in intricate and important cases, both in the time of heathenism and after their reception of Christianity. Decision by any of these methods was called by them Sudom Bogie, "The judgment of God."*

They were also accustomed to decide minor cases by oath, or by kissing the cross. This last, in course of time, became a ceremony of great importance; for, in the Sudebnik, it is enacted as follows:—" If an ambassador, or merchant, or prisoner of war, be detained in a foreign country, and the ambassador, merchant, or prisoner give his oath, by kissing the cross, that he will not run away, and if after this he abscond and escape to his own country; such person shall, throughout the remainder of his life, on every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, take his food alone, which during these days shall consist solely of bread and water; on every Tuesday and Thursday he shall have the same fare twice; and on Saturday and Sunday, water-soup twice:" moreover, to such a man the sacrament might only be administered at the hour of death;—"that it might be known unto all, that it were better to die and not kiss the cross, than, after kissing the cross, to be subject to penance for such a mortal sin."

^{*} Similar usages, not less absurd and cruel, were only abolished in our own land, by act of Parliament, in 1257.

An oath by kissing the cross could only be taken before mid-day, for the cross was not to be kissed in the afternoon; and no one, in any affair, could be permitted to swear by kissing the cross more than thrice.

Affairs not exceeding a rouble in value, which could not at once be determined, were settled by lot.

The suspected person, in every case, was subjected to the torture. They employed rods, racks, the knout, and other horrible instruments of cruelty. This mode of trying criminals seems to have been coeval with Russian courts of justice. Olearius, Herberstine, and others, have fully described the awful scenes of torture which were common in their times, at the trial of criminal cases in Moscow; and though Peter the Great made some efforts to diminish their frequency, yet they continued in full force throughout the empire, until Catherine II. put an end to them. Alexander afterwards, in a ukaz of the 27th of September 1801, interdicted, in the strongest terms, every kind of torture in the administration of justice; and, by a subsequent ukaz, forbad the slitting of the nostrils and the branding of such as were condemned to be knouted and sent to Siberia.

The children of Jaroslaff changed the capital punishment for murder into a fine. For striking with a stick, the fine was twelve grivans (4s.); for putting out an eye, maining a leg or an arm, twenty grivans; and if the person were old, only ten! All these fines flowed into the treasury of the prince, and formed a considerable part of his revenue.

The punishment of capital crimes by death was again restored in after ages, though it is not exactly known by whom. The Empress Elizabeth again abolished it; and the present Emperor Nicholas revived it, in one instance at least—the punishment of the leaders of the sedition in 1826; they were hanged.

The Grand-duke Vasilli Ioanovitch, who reigned in the year 1606, usually punished those murderers only with death, who committed the act for the purpose of robbing: they were hanged. No execution could take place until information had been given to the sovereign.

The Code of Alexie awarded death, not only to the murderer, but to him also who had instigated him to the crime: they were broken on the wheel, hanged, decapitated, or knocked on the head with a club, and thrown into the river. If a woman had murdered her husband, she was interred alive up to her neck, and left to the mercy of the hungry dogs: the terms of the enactment are, "And hold her in the earth until she die in the place."

Robbers and thieves also, according to the Ulojenie, were punished by death; but they had six weeks granted for repentance, after their sentence was passed and before execution, and were kept in a warm room; whereas other great criminals were kept in a cold room, even in the severest winter weather. Forgers had melted metal poured down their throats. The debtor was delivered to his creditor, to be his slave, until he should pay his debts. Catherine II., like Peter the Great before her, made a great shew, at one period of her reign, of becoming the Legislatrix of Russia; but though she founded a Commission in 1766 for this purpose, and wrote instructions to them herself, yet they never seem to have produced any thing of lasting importance to the empire. The true state of the matter appears to be simply this —that a settled system of equitable law cannot well exist under a completely despotic government; hence, though most of the modern sovereigns of Russia have made a stir, at some one period of their reign, to give to their subjects a well-digested civil and criminal code, yet the attempt has usually come to nothing. But, as has already been stated, the Russian laws of all kinds are every day added to, moulded, and remoulded, by the reigning sovereign, at his pleasure: it may therefore be said, that the unabrogated ukazes of these sovereigns, especially from the days of Peter I. to the present time, contain, strictly speaking, the laws of the Russians.

It is gratifying to learn, that, through the vigilance of Nicholas, a full Collection of all these ancient and modern laws, or ukazes of the empire has already been printed, with the presses and types formerly used for printing the Scriptures by the suspended Russian Bible Society; and that a Commission is now engaged in digesting these materials, with the view of presenting to the Russians a consistent body of equitable law, both civil and criminal, suited to the present improved state of the nation.

In the government of the empire, the sovereign has the aid of a Council of thirty-six members, composed generally of the principal boiars, together with the ministers for the several departments of Justice, the Interior, Foreign Affairs, War, Marine, Finances, and Public Instruction. At the head of this Council is a President: this honourable station is now filled by Count Kotchubey, a nobleman of excellent character, of extensive knowledge and experience, and a friend to every thing that is good.

When he is unwilling to decide on any matter presented to him by his ministers, the sovereign sends it to be examined by this privy-council, which reports to him thereupon; thus proving a valuable assistant to himself, and a salutary check upon the ministers, who are the more cautious what they submit for the approbation of the Emperor, not knowing but it may be canvassed in this assembly.

The peculiar state of jurisprudence in Russia, by which all matters belonging to the administration of justice are in the hands of the servants of the crown, will account for the fact, that there are but few persons in that country in the profession of the law. There is indeed little scope for the practice of private individuals in matters of right and wrong: hence, the only class of private individuals who may be styled free practitioners in legal matters are the Straeptschi, or men of business; a humble class of persons, who are employed by contending parties to watch the progress of their affairs in going through the courts, to arrange for the payment of fees, &c.

The complaints which have often been made by travellers, and that in no very measured terms, respecting this and other courts and public offices—viz. that the administration of justice in Russia is little better than a system of cheating and bribery—have, alas! but too much foundation in truth. For when the inexperienced private individual comes in contact with these functionaries, how often is he obliged to offer gifts, in one form or other, as an inducement to them to do their duty! indeed, without this, it is nearly impossible for him to obtain a decision in any matter. But while this is confessed, and has been justly censured, exposed, and condemned, few have attempted to lay open the principal causes of these abuses. The following, I believe, are two of the chief sources of this crying evil: 1st, The want of publicity in all legal matters; every thing being kept secret, and the state of the case never being known till decided upon: Catherine II. ordered all the doors of the courts of justice to be made of transparent glass, as an emblem of the system she wished to introduce; but, since her time, the glass doors have been removed, and closed doors and Egyptian darkness again envelope the course of legal matters. 2dly, There are very few offices under Government that have such salaries attached to them as the functionaries can comfortably live upon. The salaries indeed of the civil servants of the crown, in all departments, are so low, and so disproportioned to their rank and manner of life, that no man without a private fortune can support a family upon them. Few officers in the civil, judicial, and commercial offices receive from the crown one-third of what is requisite for their maintenance, in the station of society which they occupy; and the constant progress of civilization and refinement in these classes is daily augmenting the disproportion: hence they are, in some sense, compelled to make those who need their services pay for them, in the shape of podarki, "presents," or in some other way. And as the laborious and active departments of Government, such as those of Justice, Commerce, and Police, are seldom filled by nobles of independent fortune, but by individuals who have risen by their education and talents, we need not wonder if, under these circumstances, venality and corruption are found to prevail among them

The Russian Government, though well knowing this fertile root of mal-administration, cannot, without mighty changes, put an effectual stop to it. To do this, the civil and criminal code must be fixed upon an unalterable basis, and the revenues of the empire be doubled, in order to enable them to increase the salaries of the civil servants of the crown, to at least threefold of what they now are. Still, even as matters stand, much might be effected by a reduction of the number of the civil servants. It is with the Government of Russia as with many of the nobles—their domestic establishments are upon a scale too extensive for their revenue: and it were well for both to consider, whether their affairs would not be better managed, and become far more prosperous, were they to disband one-half of their Asiatic retinue; for the public establishment, like the families of the nobility, generally contain more than double the number of persons absolutely required to carry on the business.

This overstocking of every office under Government is another fruit of that pernicious principle, now become so prevalent in Russia—that without rank, a man is nothing in society. Hence, as was formerly stated, the youth press into office, civil or military, at a premature age: for unless they do this, they have no prospect of arriving at distinction in their native land, whatever be their hereditary titles, or the acquired or natural abilities which they may possess.

Here, then, is an extensive field for reformation. Let us hope that the present wise, energetic, and humane monarch who sits upon the throne of the Tzars, who has already begun a reform of the courts of Justice, will adopt such comprehensive measures as shall ultimately realize this most desirable object, and give to the nation a code of equitable and stable laws: for, from what we have stated, it must I think appear evident, that most of the abuses here depicted have their foundation in the system itself, and in the circumstances of those to whom the administration of justice is confided.

RUSSIAN PROVERBS,

ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE CHARACTER OF THE RUSSIANS.

For an evil tongue, the head flies off.

They who hunt the bear do not sleep over the sport.

He ran from the wolf, and fell in with the bear.

CHAP. XV.

Departure from Moscow—Arrival in Twer—Interview with the Princess Sophia Mestchersky—Her benevolent labours, and Religious and Moral Publications—The Emperor Alexander—Her account of his conversion, and piety—her estimate of his character and account of his death—Departure from Twer, and safe arrival in St. Petersburg—Concise statement of the labours of the Russian Bible Society.

AFTER spending several agreeable days among my Moscow friends, I began my journey towards Petersburg, about five o'clock in the evening; and continuing, as usual, to travel all night, reached Twer in the afternoon of the following day. Here I had the great pleasure of meeting with my noble friend, the Princess Sophia Mestchersky, on a visit to her aged father, General Vsevolojsky. She was staying with her brother, who is the Civil Governor of the province, and is known as the author of a valuable work in two volumes, viz. a Historical and Biographical Dictionary of the Empire of Russia, in the French language; printed at Moscow in the year 1813.

This princess, ever since the year 1811, has been most zealously and indefatigably engaged in promoting works of piety and benevolence among her countrymen. She was among the first who encouraged me to attempt, in 1811, the formation of a Bible Society in Moscow; which, as has been related, was realized in the year 1813. She even went with me herself to Moscow, and exerted all her influence, among the returning nobility, to bring about the formation of this institution. She became a most valuable and active member of the Prison Society, which was afterwards established in St. Petersburg; following the example of Mrs. Fry, in reading and expounding the Holy Scriptures to the prisoners several times a week. The hospitals, also, and poor-houses of Petersburg partook largely of her bounty and of her visits of mercy. But her most important work for Russia has been the translation, composition, and publication of a number of Religious and Moral Treatises in the Modern Russ, written in such a style of ease and simplicity, as to adapt them to all classes. The first of her publications of this kind appeared in 1813, just as the French abandoned Moscow—an "Address to the Afflicted." Nothing could have been more appropriate to the state of the ruined and scattered inhabitants of Moscow, than this Tract; it was received and read with profit and delight. From this commencement, in 1813, till my leaving Russia, the princess had published ninetythree different pieces, amounting to upwards of 400,000 copies, on religious and moral subjects, which together form eight volumes 8vo., and which were gratuitously distributed, or sold at low prices. The largest among these are, a volume of Sermons by Walker of Truro, called "The Christian, or the Believer a New Creature;" —"Buchanan's Researches in India,"—"Conversations between a Mother and her Children on Spiritual subjects," written by herself,—and a volume on Protestant Missions to the Heathen, of her own compiling. rest consist of Legh Richmond's three valuable Tracts, —"Addison on Christianity,"—a Selection from Hannah More's Tracts,—the principal publications of the London Religious Tract Society,—several pieces from the German, two written by myself,—and a Selection of Tracts from the writings of the late Archbishop Tikon, of Zadonsk, and from those of the late Metropolitan Michael of St. Petersburg.

In the preparation and publication of these most useful works, I gave her my constant assistance. The expenses of printing and binding were borne for many years by the Princess herself; for, although many of the bishops, most of whom encouraged their circulation, remitted money for the copies which they sold, yet she at different times sunk upwards of 10,000 roubles in the undertaking. At last, the Emperor privately stept forward, and desired to take a part in this useful and pious labour, so well calculated to enlighten his subjects; and, at four different times, he contributed 12,000 roubles in aid of it. Most of these publications were sanctioned by the spiritual censors;—a singular proof of the degree of pure Christian doctrine which still remains in the Russian Indeed, provided you keep clear of the dispute respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost, the number of the sacraments, the invocation of saints, prayers for the dead, &c., you may state all the vital doctrines of the Gospel, without fear of having the work rejected by the spiritual authorities. Since I left Petersburg—the princess having retired to her estates at Lattoshino, in the interior, where she now principally resides—the re-publication of these useful Tracts has been taken up by other pious friends in Petersburg; so that their circulation is still going forward, with pleasing tokens of usefulness. In 1832, these friends printed 120,000 copies. Indeed, their publication formed a new era in Russia with regard to religious books; for the standard dogmatical or religious works of the Russians are all in the Slavonian character and tongue; so that when these Tracts made their appearance in the modern character and language, and written in a style of simplicity and elegance, instead of the stiff scholastic manner of the ecclesiastical writings, Religion, seeming to have put on a more attractive dress, was brought nearer and made more intelligible to readers of all classes. And it is only since these works appeared, that the New Testament has cast off its ancient Slavonic dense veil of the tenth century, and Christ and his Apostles have been permitted to address the Russian nation in their modern tongue.

But the main spring of all these Christian and benevolent exertions was certainly the Emperor; for, in a country like Russia, nothing of the kind could go on without the approbation of the ruling powers. And as this noble protector of Bible Societies is now no more, and as the Russian Bible Society was suspended, not by him, but by the present sovereign, I shall here subjoin a few particulars respecting the late Emperor.

The question is frequently asked, "What has Alexander I. done for Russia?"—This is a question which will be better understood and appreciated a hundred years hence, than at the present day. But it is not difficult even now to furnish a satisfactory reply. extended the boundaries of the empire, by adding to it Finland, Georgia, and Bessarabia. He drew forth the resources of the country; and raised the political, commercial, and national influence of Russia to a height far superior to what had been attained by any of his predecessors. He invited into his dominions many thousands of German colonists, and settled them in Georgia, the Crimea, Bessarabia, on the Wolga, around Odessa, and in the steppes of Little Tartary; thus, at the same time, peopling and civilizing these distant parts of his empire.

He introduced, as we have elsewhere shewn, into the spiritual schools for the clergy, a system of solid education by which, in the present day, the state of learning among the Russian clergy is greatly improved; and is become as far superior to that of their brethren in Greece, as it is inferior to that of the clergy of Western Europe.

He reformed and extended the course of education in the Universities of the empire, augmenting the number of seminaries, gymnasiums, and schools. And though education, notwithstanding all his efforts to promote it, is but partially diffused, yet a foundation has been laid by him for Scriptural education on the Lancasterian system, by the introduction of Scripture Lessons into the schools; and he has, moreover, enjoined upon all a religious education.

He was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences, not merely by renovating the institutions founded by his predecessors for the promotion of these objects, but by sending many young artists to Rome, to study painting and sculpture, at his own expense. Others he sent out to England, France, and Germany, to study the arts of agriculture, mechanics, manufactures, medicine, &c. &c., with the view of promoting the improvement of his people.

He encouraged navigation among his maritime subjects; and it was in his reign that the Russian navigators first undertook to sail round the world, under the conduct of Kotzebue, Krusenstern, and Golovnin.

He enriched the cabinets of Natural History with valuable additions; such as, Forster's Mineralogical Collections, Loder's Anatomical Museum, and a Collection of Paintings which formerly belonged to Mr. Kozwelt of Amsterdam, for which 200,000 roubles were given; he also paid 960,000 francs for the Gallery of Malmaison.

He encouraged the study of the Oriental languages, by sending men of ability to Pekin to acquire the Chinese and Mandjur languages, in the monastery belonging to the Greek Church in that capital; by founding a school for Persian, Arabic, Turkish, Mongolian, and Kalmuck, in connexion with the University of St. Petersburg; and by aiding with liberal donations the publication of Oriental works—such as Dr. Schmidt's History of the Mongols.*

He encouraged scientific research in every part of his vast dominions; by which the invaluable natural resources of the empire are becoming more and more known to its inhabitants, and made available to the good of the community.

He reformed, to a certain extent, the jurisprudence of the country: though, notwithstanding his efforts, such was the power, extent, and inveteracy of the mal-practices in this department, that the administration of justice was still left at a low ebb at the time of his decease.

He emancipated the serfs of Esthonia and Courland from the bondage in which they had been held, and placed them in the rank of free men. He abolished torture, and the branding of the face and slitting of the nostrils of criminals condemned to the knout and Siberia. He deprived the nobles of the power of sending their refractory serfs to Siberia, until tried and found guilty in a court of justice; he also took from them the power of selling their slaves individually.

In 1823, he divided the empire into twelve General Governments; and placed every three or four provinces under a Military Governor, who stood in immediate relation with himself. This was done, principally, with the view of concentrating the administration of justice in the provinces, and of checking the numerous abuses of power practised by Civil Governors, Vice-governors, and those under them. For the same purpose, and to counteract the same evils, he divided Siberia into two General Governments; for it was found that the distance of places was so immense in that country, as enormously to retard every legal process, and occasion a proportionate additional expense.

He travelled frequently into different parts of his dominions, in order personally to inspect the public institutions, to ascertain the condition of the people, and to relieve their grievances and distress, whenever they were so fortunate as to be able to bring them before him.

He also encouraged the amelioration of the native breed of sheep, horses, and cattle: and the manufactories of Russia, with all the disadvantages against which they have had to contend, certainly made greater progress under Alexander than in any preceding reign.

He liberally encouraged, by grants of money, the translation of many valuable scientific, moral, and religious works from European languages into Russ; and he richly rewarded Karamzin, for his extensive labours in writing the best history that we possess of Russia, from the earliest ages till the accession of the present dynasty of Romanoff to the throne.

Being most passionately fond of architecture, and possessing an uncommonly good taste in this art, he beautified Petersburg, Moscow, and many other cities and towns throughout his empire, by the erection of a great number of splendid public edifices.

He encouraged the formation of a Philanthropic Society in Petersburg and Moscow, which has been liberally supported in both capitals, and has done much to relieve the destitute and sick.

He readily entered into the benevolent plans of Walter Venning, Esq., for the improvement of prison discipline; and a society was formed in Petersburg, in 1819, for this express purpose, which has contributed greatly to the amelioration of the prisons of Petersburg, and has also extended its beneficial effects into several of the provincial prisons.

He established an Asylum for Jewish Converts, by appointing to them extensive lands on the Sea of Azoff, to which he annexed distinguished civil privileges, under the direction of a Dutch Committee in St. Petersburg. And on signing the ukaz for this institution, he said to Prince Galitzin: "Now, should we see no good results from this institution for fifteen years to come, I shall not complain; for this is a work which entirely depends on the Divine blessing."

And—though last, not least—he encouraged the foundation and the labours of Bible Societies in his dominions, and the translation and distribution of the New Testament and of the Psalms in the Modern Russ; and it may truly be affirmed, that by the publication of 876,106 copies of the Scriptures, in nearly thirty different languages and dialects, he has laid a foundation for the civil, religious, and moral improvement of his countrymen, superior, in its nature and probable results, to all that has been effected by his other unwearied exertions for their welfare.

That the character of the late Emperor of Russia should be still an enigma with many who formerly thought very highly of him, is the less to be wondered at, when the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed, taken in connexion with his enlightened Christian principles and experience, are duly considered. The voice of truth and time, however, will gradually remove all doubts respecting the Christian sincerity of a monarch who, during the latter part of his reign, was, in many respects, an ornament to the Christian name, and an invaluable blessing to the nation over which Providence had placed him. Condescension of manners, genuine kindness of heart, a natural fear of acting or deciding wrong, a strong sense of his responsibility, as a sovereign, to God, a consciousness of his own imperfections as a man, united, nevertheless, with a capacious mind, well cultivated, and possessing a strong turn for mathematical accuracy —to which may be added, a boundless desire to promote the temporal and spiritual good of his subjects, a constant readiness to encourage every plan which had this object in view, and a sincere joy at every opportunity afforded him of relieving the distressed, the unfortunate, the poor, the suffering—sincere and strong religious impressions—extensive knowledge of mankind, and a proneness, as the result of this knowledge, to distrust them—these seem to have been the leading features of this noble character.

It may truly be affirmed of Alexander I., that he never inflicted a wound, even upon the guilty, with the one hand, without pouring into it oil and wine with the other. He ruled the Russians with unprecedented mildness, which made many worthless characters presume on his lenity. Such was the genuine kindness of his heart, that some of his principal defects in the government of his subjects may be traced to this very source.—On his political career, however, and the distinguished events of his reign, during the French invasion of Russia, the overthrow of Buonaparte, the taking of Paris, &c., it is not my intention to enter; the object of these, and the following remarks from one of his own friends, is simply to endeavour to throw some further light on his character as a man and a Christian.

The Princess Mestchersky enjoyed the intimate acquaintance and friendship of the late Emperor Alexander, for many years previous to his decease. He valued her superior talents and acquirements, and derived pleasure and edification from her intimate knowledge both of doctrinal and experimental Christianity. His death proved a severe stroke to her; it was a topic which she dwelt upon, in several of her letters written to me at the And as the religious character of Alexander I. has been much suspected even by some who formerly used to think favourably of it, and as it is but partially known to the world at large, I take the liberty of here introducing some extracts of a communication from the princess on this interesting subject, written at the time of his death, which will no doubt be read with pleasure. It is the lively effusion of a fervent and energetic mind, and bears the marks of a friendly partiality; yet there are matters of fact stated, and just views of the real religious character of the late Emperor given, which few except herself had sufficient opportunities of knowing, or ability to appreciate.

"St. Petersburg, June 1, 1826.

".... View the Emperor Alexander, sovereign of an immense empire, at the head of a formidable army, proud of his power, full of the fire of youth, and ambitious of the glory of this world! He neglects, he misunderstands the source of all his blessings; and, trusting to an arm of flesh, he beholds victory and triumph before him, forgetting that 'no king is saved by the multitude of a host—a mighty man is not delivered by much strength.' He is still totally destitute of true faith. Buonaparte, like a thunderbolt, smites his troops in all quarters—they flee before this genius of evil, this messenger of wrath; and, in a short time, the Emperor beholds a part of his empire devastated, the ancient capital of his dominions delivered to the flames, his people flying from city to city, his troops scattered in disorder, and without supplies: all around reigns desolation, and blood flows on every side.

"In this state of distress, the Lord yet supports him, but without revealing Himself to him: He inspires him with courage and firmness: then He approaches nearer, and darts on his soul a ray of His grace, by the following means.

"About the middle of the year 1812, the Emperor, about to quit St. Petersburg, and having already taken leave of his august family, had retired into his cabinet, and, quite alone, was employed in arranging some affairs before his departure. All at once he beheld a female enter, whom, at first, he did not recognise, there being little light in the room. Astonished at this apparition for never was a woman permitted to enter his cabinet without leave, not even of his own family, and above all at this unseasonable hour—he, however, arose, went to meet her, and perceived it to be the Countess Tolstoi; who, excusing herself for the liberty she had taken from a desire to wish him a happy journey, presented him at the same time with a paper. The Emperor, at all times condescending, and sensible of the least proof of attachment, thanked her, and bade her adieu. The paper he supposed to contain a petition for something, and therefore put it in his pocket; and, when she was gone, resumed his former employment. Soon after, he took his departure, without thinking more about it.

from his pocket, opened it, and saw with surprise that it contained the Ninety-first Psalm. He read it with pleasure, and its divine contents calmed his troubled spirit; and his heart said in secret—'Oh! that these words were addressed to me!' As this thought passed through his mind, some one entered the room and interrupted him: he again set off, and all was forgotten.

"A considerable time after this, he found himself in Moscow, in one of the most critical periods of his life— (who can be ignorant of the terrible events of the memorable year 1812?) Alone in his cabinet, he was arranging some books on a table, one of which caused a volume of the Bible to fall down (it was De Sacy's version, in 4to.): in falling, it opened, and the Emperor, on taking it up, happened to cast his eye upon the page, and beheld again the Psalm which had once comforted him!—At this time he recognised the voice which called him; and he replied and said: "Here I am, Lord! speak to thy servant!" He read, he applied what he read, and he found every word suitable to himself; and ever after, until his last breath, he carried this Psalm about his person, learned it by heart, and evening and morning recited it at his devotions*.

"Now the bruised heart of the monarch received this beam of light with joy; and from the moment that the

* After the death of his majesty, his valet-de-chambre stated, that the Emperor had always a certain paper in his pocket, which he prohibited them from touching, otherwise than to remove it from one coat-pocket to another, according as he changed his uniform. No person had any knowledge of its contents, or believed that it could be any other than a paper of importance which the Emperor had received in some mysterious way; it was only when they opened it, at his decease, that they recognised the soul and the sentiments of him whom they deplored. They sent this precious paper to the Empress Dowager, at St. Petersburg; and it was put into his coffin along with him.

new creature was born, he applied himself incessantly to the study of the Divine word, which he never put from him. He now came to know his weakness; he cried unto God; and, without compulsion, or the instrumentality of any one, he fell at the feet of the Lord: and the Lord armed him, like David, with faith and experience; whereupon, behold! a new Goliath falls beneath the strokes of him, whom, but a short time before, he expected to vanquish.

"We will not, however, attempt to follow this Christian hero in the brilliant career of his victories; but merely remark, that he himself spoke of them in the following terms: — 'I felt myself,' said he, 'like a child; experience had taught me my insufficiency; faith made me commit myself entirely to Him, who had spoken to me in the Psalm, and had inspired me with a security and a force altogether new to me. At every fresh difficulty to be overcome, at every decision to be taken, or question to be solved, I went, if I had an opportunity, and threw myself at the feet of my Father who is in heaven—or, recollecting myself for a few moments, I cried to Him from the bottom of my heart and all was smoothed, decided, and executed marvellously; all difficulties fled before the Lord, who marched before me. Without ceasing, I read His word. I remember, that one day, on entering a small town on the frontier of France, the name of which town I have forgotten, sitting in my calash, I was reading in the New Testament about the eunuch of Queen Candace reading the Prophet Isaiah, and desiring some one to explain to him what he read. I then thought within myself—'Oh! that God would also send me some one, to help me rightly to understand His holy will.' And at the very time I was desiring this in my heart, Madam Krudner sent, asking permission to see me. For a short time I believed that it was she whom God intended to employ for this purpose; but very soon I perceived that this light was nothing more than an ignis fatuus.'—These are his own words.

"And, truly, it was the will of God that none but Himself should instruct and guide this soul of His own choice—this heart open to His love. And I must say, that I have often been astonished—and not only I, but other persons also, even the most instructed and advanced Christians, have been compelled to admire his enlightened faith, and his deep knowledge, drawn purely from the sacred scriptures—his true humility, and how he gave himself up to that simplicity which the Lord requires, when He promiseth, 'Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

"Whence had he this Divine knowledge? We know all those who surrounded him—all with whom he spoke on the subject of religion; but I am bold to say that there was not one among them who had reached his stature. His noble and tender spirit soon felt the chilling atmosphere of his court; and he spoke no more of religion, or of the state of his soul, or of his pious sentiments, except to the very few whom he knew to be of the same mind with himself.

"The two last years of his life were years of suffering. Sometimes sick himself, and not willing to shew it, lest he should alarm his relatives and friends, he allowed his health to be silently undermined by evils which he did not oppose, until he was forced to do so in order not to fall an immediate sacrifice to them: at other times, he suffered exceedingly on account of the incurable disease of his august spouse the Empress, whom he seldom quitted in her sickness. He attended her during that period, as if she had been a favourite child: night and day he watched her himself, and administered the medicine to her, first tasting whatever was given: he marked with anxiety the least change, the slightest alteration in her case—a case which presented nothing but symptoms of despair.

"At length, fatigued with the cares and endless labours connected with the government of an immense empire—in a word, ripe for eternity, his existence was no more for this world. The change in his health was such, and so sudden, for one formerly so active and laborious, as to render him sedentary and languid: his lively and communicative temper became sad, and frequently melancholy, notwithstanding all the efforts which he made to vanquish it, and notwithstanding the extreme kindness of his heart, which feared to afflict others by shewing its own sufferings.

"His fine figure seemed now to be covered, as it were, with a cloud: his kind looks, and smile of benevolence, were become like the gentle severity of the setting sun. Exercises of piety and beneficence remained the only refuge of his noble mind—the only occupation which still afforded him pleasure. And did the enemy seek to poison this last source of his pleasure? Yes, this exercise, which had little calculated to tempt, was mixed with bitterness and pain towards his latter end. The Lord permitted the enemy severely to try His faithful servant, even in all the recesses of his heart:—he was tried here below by the sharpest fiery trials; and when it was made manifest that he had kept the faith, then he finished his course, and went to receive that crown which is reserved for all them who love His appearance.

"'Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven!'—And who, more than Alexander, renounced that spirit which the world admires? Who, more than he, in their respective stations, endeavoured to preserve that simplicity which Christianity requires? Who has given us a better proof than he has, that 'God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble'? Was it not his gentleness which captivated all hearts—which gained the confidence even of those whom he had vanquished? During his twenty-five years' reign, no person was ever punished in his anger. Even those who had merited his resentment, he punished only by withdrawing his countenance from them;—and even then, when he found that he was afflicting them, how did it pain his heart! how much did it cost him! He strove, like his Divine Master, to be meek and humble of heart; and into His rest he has now entered.

"'Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted!'—How often have I been witness to the tears of Alexander I., when speaking of the errors of his youth, and admiring the mercy of God towards himself —when enumerating the things he had to reproach himself with on the review of his past life—when rendering thanks to our Saviour, who had manifested Himself to his wandering heart—or when he spoke of that future life of eternal happiness and repose, which is promised to the Children of God, and towards which his soul aspired! And how often have I seen the promise of consolation verified in his experience!—a heavenly smile of hope always beamed through his tears, like the rays of the sun piercing the thin cloud which in its passage had obstructed for a moment his shining.*

^{*} In illustration of the above statement, I give the following anecdote, received from undoubted authority. "After the death of his beloved natural

"'Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy.'—He was a lover of justice, and sought for it everywhere: he studied the justice of God, with the view of regulating his own by it: he always yielded with firmness and resignation to truth, and required it of all who approached him. Who was ever punished for having told the truth to Alexander I.? He hungered after it. Yet, O God of justice and mercy! Thou hast beheld, and we all have seen and can testify, that mercy was the soul of all his actions. What examples, what deeds of mercy, might not be instanced here? His enemies and strangers, no less than his own subjects, were witnesses thereof, and equally partook of it. During the war, and at the taking of Paris, during his journeys in the interior of his dominions, and especially at the time of the inundation of his capital—then we beheld our sovereign mingling his tears with the unfortunate, who deplored the loss of wives, of children, of parents, and of property—then we saw him mixing in the crowd, encompassed by weeping mothers and widows, shaking them by the hand, assuaging their griefs, munificently relieving their wants, and pronouncing to them these memorable words of a humble Christian: 'My Children! it is on my account that you suffer—it is I—it is my sins which God is visiting upon you!' And the poor sufferers seemed to forget their misfortunes for a while, in beholding his affliction on their account: they were astonished at the sight of such a compassionate being, accusing himself in their presence: and they natural daughter, Sophia, he was one day accosted publicly, in condolence on the event, by a foreign ambassador. The Emperor looked down for some time, and mused in silence: then, raising his head, he replied, I thank you, Sir, for thus reminding me of the sins of my youth: —and, as he spoke these words, he seemed much affected."

exclaimed: 'Blessed is the man who resembles thee! he shall be called beloved, for he shall obtain mercy.'*

"Who is able to enumerate his acts of benevolence, the returns of love from his regenerated soul to its Saviour? —I shall give you merely one instance. A foreigner in the Russian service, accused of misconduct, had been convicted, and condemned to be sent to Siberia; and his sentence had been forwarded to the Emperor for confirmation. The wife of this unhappy man, the mother of six young children, and pregnant with the seventh, happened to overhear an old woman speaking of the Emperor with admiration, and exclaiming—'And who art thou, so young and so beautiful — who art thou, that accusest thyself as the cause of our sufferings? Thou resemblest an angel, and art so merciful! canst thou, then, compare thy sins with ours?' The poor woman, after frequently hearing the goodness of the sovereign thus spoken of, at last formed the resolution to go to him and implore his mercy. She told her plan to no one, but went to Tzarskoi-Selo, accompanied by all her little children: there she waylaid the Emperor, in one of the walks of the palace-garden, saying to herself, 'If he be alone, I will stop him; but if there be any one with him, I will say nothing.' In a short time, she saw him arrive in his calash, quite alone: she held up her white handkerchief above her head, and waved it, as a signal to attract his notice. The Emperor, seeing her, stopped short, and asked what she wanted: 'O Sire!' said she, 'I ask nothing but mercy—mercy and pardon only!' The Emperor questioned her, remembered the case of her husband, and spoke of She interrupted him at that word, and exclaimed, 'I ask not for justice, Sire, but for mercy. O Sire! if you say that God will pardon you your sins, pardon, then, to us our transgressions!' She spoke English with him. The Emperor, covering his eyes with his hand, retired a little, and then replied: 'Well, I will do it.'—'Will you?' continued the woman. 'Yes, I will.'—'But will you, indeed?' 'Yes, I give you my word.'—'Then give me your hand!' said the poor woman, in a transport of gratitude; and the Emperor went and took her by the hand, and pressed it kindly. He accordingly arrested the execution of justice; the case remained undecided in his own hands; and he continued to give her the salary which her husband had received.

^{*}As another interesting proof of his humanity I give the following.—At the fearful moment, when he perceived that the waters were rising to an unusual height, and that the sentinels stationed at the Government stores on the Island of Vasilli Ostroff would be in danger, the Emperor, well knowing that they would sooner perish than quit their posts, ordered his droshka, and drove to the different places on the island; liberating all the sentinels, some of whom he found already up to their waists in water.

- "Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God.'—O Lord! is it not a heart purified by Thy Holy Spirit, which is meant here—a heart which receives His light, and which of His word makes a lamp to enlighten its steps, and a law to point out the path in which to walk? Is it not the man that seeks to be justified, not of himself, but through the sacrifice of Thy Divine Son and the merits of His death—who, to the last, strives to purify his heart in that blood which was shed upon the cross to cleanse us from our iniquities? Is not this the heart, O my Lord! which our Divine Saviour invites to enter into the joy of His heavenly Father?
- "'Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the Children of God.'—That Alexander was a peace-maker, the whole of Europe, or rather the whole world, can bear testimony. He was one of God's chosen, sent to keep peace in Europe, for more than ten years: he acquired the confidence of the nations, though divided in their interests and eager for conquest. He reconciled them, and united them by the cords of his own love: his word, founded on the word of God, was equivalent to treaties and guarantees. He pacified all hearts, because his own heart was at peace with God. He had received that peace which our Saviour left as the heritage of his disciples and his faithful ones. And the whole of Europe still enjoys peace, through the instrumentality of this peace-maker.

- "'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'—This last beatitude may seem inapplicable to our late great and powerful monarch. But the inner man—the true Christian in him—did suffer persecution; the malice of the wicked has frequently calumniated this faithful servant of God. They accused him of hypocrisy: not being able to understand his heart, they judged of it from their own. Oh! read the details—he always pardoned his enemies. Did not his love pity them, saying merely that 'he knew them?' and frequently, too frequently, his noble soul grieved over them.
- "Happy art thou, august monarch! It was on account of thy Saviour—on account of thy love to Him—on account of thy faith, that they spake evil of thee. But now thy soul is perfect in happiness; for thine is the kingdom of heaven. Great, great is the recompence which thou hast received!
- "He died in peace, after having passed two of the happiest months which he had spent in this world; and his last words, after having received the communion, were—

'I have never felt so happy!' He was tired of his crown, he was tired of his throne, for he had taken up his cross to follow the Lord; and often, very often, had he longed for the moment when he should be called to lay it down, with his life, at the feet of his Saviour."

The following Imperial Ukaz, or Proclamation for a General Thanksgiving throughout Russia, issued by Alexander from his head-quarters at Carlsruhe, Dec. 6, 1813, O. S. bears characteristic marks of the devout and humble state of his mind, after his great victories; and it is here given as a further illustration of his character.

"Beloved Subjects! A year is elapsed since we were called upon to return thanks to God, for delivering our realms from the hands of cruel and powerful enemies. Scarcely is the present year expired, and already our victorious banners are erected on the banks of the Rhine. Europe, which was armed against us, is now voluntarily marching with us. All the nations which lie between Russia and France follow our example, and, having united their arms with ours, turn them against the oppressor of the nations.

"So great a change upon earth could only have been effected by the special power of God. The destiny of nations and of states rises and falls by the power of His Almighty arm. Who is powerful without Him? Who is strong and stable, unless by His will? Let us turn to Him, with our whole heart and mind. Let us not be proud of our own deeds. Let us never imagine that we are more than weak mortals. What are we? So long as the hand of God is with us, we may possess wisdom and might: but without Him, we are nothing. Let all praise of man, therefore, be silenced before Him. Let each of us present the sacrifice of praise to Him, to whom it is due. Our true glory, and honour, is humility before Him. We are convinced that each of our faithful subjects always feels this, and especially after so much Divine goodness has been poured out upon us. Animated, therefore, by these sentiments of humility and zeal, we ordain, on the present occasion, that, throughout our whole empire, every temple of God be opened; that in every church solemn thanksgivings be offered, on bended knees, to the Maker and Disposer of all things; and that all men present tears of the warmest gratitude to Him, for the unspeakable mercy shewn unto us. By the power of his Almighty arm, He hath drawn us out of great deeps, and placed us on the pinnacle of glory. What can we render unto Him but tears of gratitude and joy!

(Signed) "ALEXANDER.

Twer.—Having got my sledge repaired, and spent part of two agreeable days in the family circle of the Vsevolodjkys, and especially with my excellent friend the Princess, I started for St. Petersburg in the evening; and, after encountering some very rough and stormy weather, bad roads, and severe frosts, I entered Petersburg in safety, about mid-day. The joy of my beloved wife and children at seeing me again, after an absence of one year and eight months, is not to be described. Our hearts were melted, in gratitude and praise towards Him who had so graciously preserved us during so long and painful a separation; in which, nevertheless, goodness and mercy were our constant theme.

As the labours of Bible Societies in Russia, during the last twelve years of the reign of Alexander, are calculated to produce important effects on the religious and moral condition of the people, and as the writer of these pages took a prominent part in all their proceedings, he deems it necessary to give to the reader a concise statement of the transactions of the Russian Bible Society, and its Auxiliaries, before the operations of these institutions were suspended, in 1826, by a ukaz of the Emperor Nicholas.

The Russian Bible Society was founded in St. Petersburg on the 23d of January 1813, by permission of the late Emperor Alexander. No sooner had the Committee been constituted, than the earnest attention of their first meeting was directed to an examination of the most judicious measures for attaining their object; and, as a preliminary step, it was resolved to apprize the whole empire of their views. This was attempted, First, by means of the publication of a small Treatise on Bible Societies in general, and on the establishment of one in St. Petersburg; 2dly, By circulars, addressed to all the Civil and Ecclesiastical Authorities, for the purpose of securing their co-operation; 3dly, By encouraging and opening subscriptions for purchasing and printing Bibles in different languages. The members of the Committee led the way, by subscribing, at their very first meeting, 5750 roubles, for immediate purposes; and the further sum of 4800 roubles annually. In addition to this, the British and Foreign Bible Society remitted 500l. sterling (or about 7000 roubles) in aid of the cause: and, on its being made known to the Emperor that the Committee had been formed, and had actually commenced their operations, his majesty became a member of the Russian Bible Society, and gave a donation of 25,000 roubles, besides an annual subscription of 10,000.

The promising auspices under which the Committee at St. Petersburg commenced their operations were attended by the happiest results: from all sides, contributions in aid of the cause flowed in; in various parts of the empire Auxiliary Bible Societies were formed; an extensive correspondence was opened; and Moscow, as we have already stated, speedily witnessed the establishment of its own Bible Society; --- so that, with the first steps taken towards the restoration of that imperial city, after the devastations of the war, a society also appeared, scattering blessings around, whose avowed object was, to supply those who had been deprived of their all, with the word of eternal life. In the course of a year, the provinces on the Baltic Sea also joined this union formed for disseminating the Bible, and established Branch Societies in Dorpat, Mitau, Riga, and Reval. Towards the close of the same year (1813), one was also established in Jarosslawl; and in the following years, Auxiliaries were formed in almost every town of importance throughout the empire, until they reached the number of 289.

As one of the principal objects of the Society was to augment the number of copies of the Holy Scriptures, already existing in different languages, the Committee lost no time in taking efficient measures for its accomplishment. Accordingly, they made it publicly known, as the design of their operations, "To furnish every family, throughout the extensive domains of the Russian empire, with a Bible, or at least a New Testament; and, ultimately, to afford to every individual the means of becoming possessed of that invaluable treasure, in his own vernacular tongue."

A beginning was soon made, to print the Holy Scriptures in those languages which are more generally current in Russia; and the Bible Society also opened a depôt for the sale of such Bibles as were either printed in the country, or received from abroad.

For the greater convenience of printing the Holy Scriptures at St. Petersburg, a stereotype printing-office was established; to which were added, in the sequel, the necessary accommodations and apparatus for bookbinding; and both departments were placed under the direction of English masters. The Committee were enabled to effect these arrangements, so essentially requisite for the furtherance of the objects of the Bible Society, chiefly by means of the continued, powerful, and benevolent aid of his Imperial Majesty himself; who was graciously pleased to grant to the Society, for the purposes above alluded to, not only a spacious stone building, but also a sum of money sufficient to answer the expenses of making various necessary alterations in it.

From the numerous letters addressed to the Committee by persons of various ranks, and inserted in its Reports, it appears that, in proportion as the Holy Scriptures were more widely diffused, by sale or gratuitous distribution, the number of testimonies, corroborative of the incalculable blessings flowing therefrom, were augmented.—In order to give the reader a better idea of the number of Bibles, Testaments, and portions of the Holy Scriptures, which have been either purchased by the Russian Bible Society, or printed at its expense and under its inspection, from its first establishment in 1813 to the year 1826, I subjoin the following details.

During the twelve years of its activity, this institution, with its 289 filial Associations, printed 208,068 Bibles, upwards of 400, 00 New Testaments, and 267,772 copies of the Psalms, the Four Gospels, and other separate parts of the Holy Scriptures; making together a total of 876,106 copies, in whole or in part, of the word of God. Of these, upwards of 118,000 copies of the Bible were in the old Slavonic, 5000 in Armenian, 5000 in Ancient Greek, 5000 in Moldavian, 15,000 in German, 7000 in Polish, 5000 in Finnish, 7000 in French, and 5000 in Esthonian. the New Testament, 140,000 copies were in Slavonian, 117,000 in Modern Russ, 8000 in Armenian, 11,000 in Modern Greek, 7000 in Georgian, 30,000 in Lettish, 10,000 in Moldavian, 22,000 in German, 5000 in Persian, 16,000 in Polish, 5000 in Samogitian, 5000 in Turkish with Armenian characters, 5000 in Tartar-Turkish, 5000 in Tartar, 3000 in Tscheremissian, 5000 in Tschuvoshian, 3000 in Mordwinian, 2000 in Kalmuck, 2000 in Mongolian, 10,000 in the Esthonian of Reval, 5000 in the Esthonian And of the of Dorpât, and 2000 in the Servian. parts of the Scriptures translated and printed by the Society, the most numerous were 145,000 copies of the Psalms in Modern Russ; and 10,000 copies of the eight first Books of the Old Testament, in the same dialect. This latter work, however, has never been suffered to see the light, having been finished about the time that the intrigues of powerful individuals among the clergy, the nobles, and the friends of the expelled Jesuits were most successful against the Society. Various excuses were made by the Synod for not giving their sanction to its publication, even when urged by the late Emperor; and, since the suppression of the Society, nothing more has been heard of it.

Among the portions of the Scriptures printed, were 2000 copies of the Gospel of St. Matthew in the Karelian; 1400 of the same Gospel, for circulation among the Zirians, by the Wologda Society; 1000 of the Book of Genesis, in Tartar; and 1000 copies of St. Matthew in the Bulgarian. In addition to these, the Four Gospels were translated into the Ossitinian, by Mr. Talgusidse; as also into the Watjakian, by the clergy of the Wiatka Committee: but I never heard of any part of these two versions having been printed.

It may be proper to add, that, of these extensive editions of the Holy Scriptures, 518,486 copies were printed at St. Petersburg; 22,000 at Astrachan; 5000 at Kazan; 79,500 at Moscow, by the Society there; 48,000 at Mitau, Riga, and Reval. And about 50,000 copies, in various European and Asiatic languages, were obtained from foreign parts.

At the suppression of the Society in 1826, it was calculated that upwards of 500,000 copies of these different versions of the Holy Scriptures had been brought into circulation, among the tribes of the Russian empire; and the remainder were left in the depôts of the Society, especially in those of Petersburg and Moscow, with permission to be sold at the same price as during the time of the Society's existence.

In taking a review of the period during which all this has been achieved, and bearing in mind the great expense and difficulties attendant on such undertakings, it may be necessary to state more particularly whence the means for their accomplishment arose. The patronage of the Emperor and of the Government, so warmly manifested, in a variety of ways, towards the institution, drew forth a great degree of zeal and liberality among the clergy and nobles; so that the receipts of the Society, during the first ten years, amounted to 1,995,168 roubles 99 kopicks in contributions, and 821,124 roubles 21 kopicks for copies of the Scriptures sold; in sterling money, 113,0521. The amount of contributions from the British and Foreign Bible Society to the Russian Bible Society and its Branches, during that period, was 16,8331. 14s. 9d. or about 354,200 roubles.

From these details, it cannot fail to strike the reader, how important were the latter years of the reign of Alexander to the temporal and eternal interests of the Russian people. No such effort was ever made, at any former period of the history of that nation—no, nor by all the sovereigns of Russia put together—to disseminate among their subjects the seed of truth and piety. Among these numerous versions of the Sacred Scriptures, that of the New Testament and Psalms, translated for the first time into the vernacular tongue, and widely dispersed among thirty-five millions who speak it, is unquestionably the greatest: nor is it possible to anticipate the blessed results which may spring up, to the latest generations, from the introduction of so much Evangelical light into the churches, families, and schools of the empire.

"The question respecting the moral benefits," says the Metropolitan Philaret*, (in his Address at the anniversary of the Moscow Bible Society in 1824,) "derived from a circulation of the Holy Scriptures, may be met by the observation, that it is reserved for posterity fully to answer it. The produce of that seed which is sown in early spring can only be ascertained in autumn; and whoever plants the kernel of a fruit-tree must be content for years to go on hoping that his labour and expense will ultimately produce appropriate fruit. He that scatters abroad the word of God sows for eternity; and who can think it late, if the seed which is thus disseminated, and which falls on the soft and more genial soil of youth under the advantages of a better education, shall yield a richer harvest in the second than in the first generation?

"Should any one, however, after what has been said, still insist upon his right to be satisfied as to the actual effects produced by the exertions of the Moscow Bible Society, on those whose previous education and acquirements may have rendered them more susceptible of religious instruction, we have a right to ask, in return, that he will consider calmly and impartially, on whom the obligation to furnish the required information really lies. The question at issue is, Whether it is the duty of a Bible Society to give an account to those, for whose benefit its exertions are made, of their salutary consequences? or whether it is fit that such as profit by these exertions should detail the effects produced by The case appears to be analogous with that of a society established in a country visited by famine, for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants with provisions; the members of which, accordingly, exert themselves in collecting money, and in forming depôts, where such as are able to pay may receive bread at a moderate price, and where the poor are even furnished gratis. Such voluntary exertions of benevolent individuals in behalf of a famished country would (and with great reason) be hailed as a proof of more than ordinary philanthropy;—and surely the most fastidious would never dream of blaming the society, if some of the natives should prefer living upon roots, rather than accept the bread offered to them; or even if a few, reduced by famine and disease, should, from absolute

As the lovers of the cause of Divine truth in Great Britain, and especially the friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society, have often anxiously inquired what were the real causes of the suppression of this noble institution in Russia, in the midst of its unprecedented course of prosperity and usefulness—and as an opinion very generally prevails among these friends, that the Emperor Alexander, in the latter years of his reign, turned his back upon that sacred work which he had formerly supported with such zeal and liberality, and that he even at last put down the Russian Bible Society—with the view of throwing some light on this interesting and somewhat mysterious subject, I subjoin the following facts.

In the latter part of the reign of the Emperor Alexander, a strong party was formed among the principal nobility and clergy in Petersburg against the Bible Society. Its principles and labours were too sacred, too much calculated to promote the spiritual happiness of the numerous tribes of Russia, not to meet with opposition: and the conspirators, who were at that time forming diabolical plans against the peace of the empire, took also the greatest pains to misrepresent to the Government the character and labours of the friends of Religion, and of Bible Institutions; and this, for the purpose of turning its attention from themselves and their own wicked revolutionary designs.

The opposition, then, with which the Russian Bible Society had to struggle, during the last three years of the reign of Alexander, was principally from these different sources; and not, as has been supposed, from any change in his own mind respecting the truly Christian character and designs of Bible Institutions. His mind was perpetually harassed by the abominable falsehoods, the wicked insinuations, and the base intrigues of this powerful though heterogeneous party; which at last obliged the noble, indefatigable, benevolent, and pious President of the society, Prince Galitzin, to lay down the Presidency. This was then conferred upon the aged metropolitan, Seraphim; under whose guidance some hoped that the institution would be permitted to prosecute its usual labours. But Seraphim himself, with several other prelates, and one or two fanatical monks, had for some years entertained unfriendly feelings towards the institution; and the latter had zealously spread their insinuations against the society, even among the better-disposed classes of the Russian nobility. The circulation of the Scriptures so extensively throughout the empire—for nearly half a million had already been sent forth from the depôts of the society—had produced among the people, in different provinces, effects that seemed suspicious to the lovers of ignorance, error, and superstition; and these gave rise to numerous communications to the Committee in Petersburg, and to the Government, from the enemies of the cause in the provinces, filled with surmises, exaggerations, and falsehoods; until, by these combined influences, the Russian Bible Society was gradually crushed, notwithstanding the protection of its Imperial friend.

When the Emperor Nicholas came to the throne, the detestable and wicked designs of the revolutionary part of the society's enemies came to light, and, by the blessing of Providence on the determined courage and wise management of the young Emperor, were happily overthrown; and then also the innocence of the Bible Society was made evident;—and, as the Emperor renewed his annual subscription, which he had been accustomed to give as Grand-duke, the friends of the society began to hope that it had weathered the storm. In this, however, they were deceived; for Seraphim, Eugenius of Pleskoff, Photius the monk, and others, never rested until they had procured from the Emperor Nicholas the following suspension act; by which the noblest of institutions was overthrown by an "imenoi ukaz."

"To the most reverend Metropolitan of St. Petersburg and Novogorod, Seraphim—

"Having taken into consideration the representations of your Eminence, and of the Metropolitan Eugenius, respecting the difficulties which present themselves to the progress of the cause of the Russian Bible Society, and the disadvantageous consequences arising therefrom—for the averting of which, considerable leisure is requisite, in order maturely and judiciously to examine into all the circumstances—and considering your opinions to be well founded, I order you, as President of the said Society, to suspend its activity in all its operations, without exception, until my further permission.

"You are hereby empowered to extend this my order to all the Committees, Branches, and Associations connected with the society, throughout Russia; and at the same time to obtain a particular account of all property, moveable and immoveable, in houses, lands, books, materials, and money, belonging to the society, wherever they are to be found; and to furnish me with the most accurate statement and the most circumstantial information possible thereupon.

"The sale of the Holy Scriptures already printed in Slavonian and Russ, as also in the other languages used among the inhabitants of the Russian Empire, I permit to be continued at the fixed prices.

"Recommending myself to your prayers &c.
(Signed) Nicholas."

Thus empowered, the Metropolitan not only suspended the operations of the 289 societies in the different provinces of the empire, but also put a stop to the printing of all the different versions of the Scriptures then in progress; and the editions of the New Testament already printed in the Servian, Mongolian, Kalmuck, and other languages, though permitted by the above ukaz to be circulated, have never yet been issued. An edition also of 10,000 copies of the first eight Books of the Old Testament in Modern Russ has never been allowed to see the light. Large supplies, however, of the Bible in Slavonian and other languages, with the New Testament and Psalms in the Modern Russ, continue to be sold at the fixed prices. And on the 14th of March 1831, a new Bible Society, exclusively for the Protestants in the Russian Empire, was formed at St. Petersburg, with the sanction of the present Emperor. This society has received a portion of the funds and of the stock of Bibles, and other property, which belonged to the old Society; and at their first annual meeting, held on the 12th of April 1832, it was reported that they had issued 11,072 copies of the sacred volume. It is peculiarly gratifying to me to be able to report this partial resurrection, under a new form, of the suspended energies of the late Russian Bible Society; and to add, that Prince Lieven, the Minister for Public Instruction, is its President—a protestant nobleman of true piety, who laboured in the cause with indefatigable zeal during the whole period of the existence of the national institution. But is nothing more to be done for the thirty-six millions of native Russians, to supply them with the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue? The terms of the ukaz led the friends of the cause to suppose that this suspension was only temporary; but nearly seven years have rolled away, and there is no appearance of the restoration of "the Russian" Bible Society.

Is it Christian—is it humane—is it politic—is it paternal, to allow the 10,000 copies of the first part of the Bible in the Modern Russ to moulder and rot in darkness, and the rest of the translation to lie neglected? Surely the present sovereign, who is a man of penetration, energy, and benevolence—who has already given many pleasing proofs of his sincere desire to advance the spiritual interests of the Russian people—will, for the good of his subjects, put an end to this most painful suspension of a work of such infinite importance; and, as he has shewn an excellent discernment, in choosing the worthy priest, Pavsky, the translator of the said Old Testament from the Hebrew into Russ, to be the spiritual instructor of his own children, on account of the admirable acquaintance with the Divine writings he has therein displayed, doubtless this paternal anxiety will soon shew that it is not confined to the Imperial sons and daughters within the walls of the palace at St. Petersburg, but extends to the youthful inmates of every hut throughout his dominions; and that he will soon withdraw his interdict to the accomplishment of this most cherished, Christian, and noble plan, which his deceased brother had formed, to bless the nation of the Russians with the whole code of Divine truth in their native tongue—with that volume, which teaches to the subject, with such simplicity and sacred authority, true loyalty and obedience to the Powers that be; and which is so indispensably necessary to every one, whether prince or peasant, as enabling him to discharge the relative duties of this life, and fully to understand the only way to eternal life in the world to come—that volume, which alone can secure to the Russians all the advantages of that civilization, towards which they are making such rapid progress, and protect them from the innumerable evils resulting from intellectual cultivation, when separated from genuine Scriptural principles that volume, which lies at the foundation of the greatness of Britain; its principles being infused, directly or indirectly, into her laws, her public institutions, and the various relations of private life; and which secures to all these a stability, even in the midst of agitations and storms arising from principles heterogeneous to this sacred Book, and by which so many other States in modern times have been overturned!

It is because the late Emperor has been so long unjustly censured for putting down the Bible Society, that I have found myself here bound to state the real cause and progress of this most lamentable event. I feel myself the more called upon thus openly to state the truth on these weighty subjects, believing that my past services to advance the best interests of the Russians—services continued for the greatest part of eighteen years, and for which, except thanks, I never received from the Government of Russia or its Bible Society the smallest remuneration—fully justify this boldness. This latter fact I would not have mentioned, had it not borne so directly upon the principle of impartiality which it has been my object to observe in writing this volume. I have endeavoured to "speak the truth in love." How far I have succeeded, I must leave to my reader, whether British or Russian, to decide.

I SHALL here record the observations which I made on the country and its inhabitants, during my journey from Petersburg to Abo.

After crossing the main branch of the Neva, about five o'clock in the afternoon, we proceeded over Vasilli Ostroff; and, driving round the palace and gardens of Kaminia Ostroff, reached the high road to Wyborg a little past six o'clock. The roads, from the very gates of Petersburg till we entered Finland, were bad—in some places consisting of sand, or of small fir-trees laid across the marshy parts; but generally they were as nature had made them. The country is varied in its surface by ravines; and the greater part of it is covered with fir, or in an uncultivated state. We travelled all night, through woods of pine and fields of corn, which, though in the middle of June, scarcely yet covers the clod. At midnight we crossed the frontier of Russia, and entered Finland. The next morning we breakfasted at Krasnoi-Selo; and from the very frontier of Finland I found the roads good, as they are all chaussée, and well kept. The country is very rocky, and abounds in large lakes, which are said to produce an abundance of fine fish. We reached the town of Wyborg*, 140 versts from St. Petersburg, about one o'clock, to dinner. Wyborg is quite unlike Russia in its appearance: indeed, as soon as one enters Finland, a higher degree of civilization is very perceptible. Wyborg is a small port, strongly fortified with bastions of irregular masses of granite and dry ditches. The houses are well constructed, exactly in the Swedish mode of building; being of wood, painted of a darkred colour, and the windows four square. It has 5000 inhabitants, three Lutheran churches, one Russian church, one Catholic church, and a Gymnasium, which is attended by about fifty students, with eight teachers: they have a district school, in which there are five teachers and seventy scholars; also two elementary schools for the lower classes. Children of the better classes, here, as in Russia, are educated at home, by private teachers. When the anniversary of the Wyborg Bible Society is held, speeches are delivered in German, in Finnish, and in Russian.

We left this place at three in the afternoon; and travelled through woods of pine, the dark foliage of which was here and there enlivened with the fairer hues of the birch. Vast plains are covered with huge granite rocks, lying scattered abroad, like the ruins of immense cities. The roads are excellent, but very narrow, being seldom more than two fathoms between the ditches.

After travelling all night, (if night it might be called, for at this season of the year it is nearly as light in the night as in a cloudy day,) at six o'clock in the morning we reached Friedricksham, a very strong fortress of stone walls and lined fosses. The houses are well built; but both here and in Wyborg there seems to be little or no commerce carried on—no stir in the streets, and nothing but a few fishing-boats in the ports.

The population of Friedricksham contains about 1000 Lutherans, of Swedish and German origin, who have a wooden church; there are also 500 Russian inhabitants, chiefly disbanded military and small merchants, and a garrison of 1500 men, who likewise have a wooden church with domes. The Finns have their own church, built of stone, for the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages, which compose a parish of 6000 souls. In 1819, the number of births in this parish was 253, of which only four were illegitimate; in 1815, births 245, all in wedlock. Here is a district Latin school, with about fifty scholars; an elementary school with twenty-five; and a girls' school with about thirty scholars; also a Russian school, for the sons of the military.

Twenty miles from Friedricksham we crossed the stream Kymeny, near its beautiful cataracts; which, in two falls, have a descent of about thirty feet, from the granite bed of rock above to the surface of the boiling and foaming abyss below. The scenery all around is captivating. As we continued our route westward, the country seemed to increase in boldness, yet without ever rising into mountains. The masses of bleached granite scattered on the surface of the ground sometimes appeared, at a distance, like the mighty camp of a large army, or the immeasurable remains of some great metropolis. I was delighted to see the peasantry flocking, in small companies, from their scattered hamlets among the rocks, to their respective central parochial churches—the females carrying in their hand their Hymn-book and folded white pocket-handkerchief: all were in the national costume, the men in white russet coats, and the females in their striped stuffs and red stockings, all of their own domestic manufacture. When we reached Pötles, I entered the village-church, and was grieved to find the Lector reading to the congregation, from the pulpit, what might be properly styled a Newspaper; announcing all the acts of the Legislature, local arrangements, decrees of magistrates, military proclamations, &c. &c. The very technicality of the expressions convinced me that such was the fact, as these were so numerous as to enable even me, who understood not a word of Finnish, to guess at the different subjects. The large assembly of peasantry seemed little interested in what was read: the poor people sat yawning, and looking wistfully round on each other, as though wondering when the last article would be finished, that they might again join in a hymn of praise before leaving the House of God, and retire to their dispersed habitations among the woods and rocks. After I had stood, in one of the passages, a spectator of this scene for upwards of fifteen minutes, I observed the pastor come limping out from beyond the pulpit (for he was lame), and speak to one or two of his better sort of hearers sitting in the front seats, as he passed by; his aged lady accompanying There seemed to be no likelihood of the newsreading being soon finished, the Lector having just taken up a second printed sheet; I therefore followed the aged pastor out of the church. As we moved on slowly through the churchyard, I addressed him in German; when, finding he answered in the same language, I expressed to him my sorrow at what I had seen, and that the poor people should have their ears and minds polluted, after Divine service was over, by the reading of so much worldly trash in the same place where they had just been hearing the message of God. As I proceeded in this strain, the aged pastor stood still; and, resting both hands on his staff, looking me in the face, he stared for a moment, and then said, "Indeed, you speak great truth!" He also was very sorry, he said, for the usage, but could not change it. I then introduced myself; told him the object of my journey; and inquired whether his flock had yet obtained Bibles from the Abo Society. He said that they had procured a number of copies from the Wyborg Society, and were in general well supplied. He invited me to go to his house, at some distance in the country, and partake of his Sunday dinner; but this I was not able to comply with; so we parted, after mutual salutations.

I recollect having been once in a church at Carlscrona, in Sweden, on a Sunday, where I heard the same reading of proclamations at the conclusion of the service. The Finns have no doubt received this Sabbath-desecrating custom from their late rulers; and hence it still remains under the present Government. It is much to be regretted; for it must greatly hurt the interests of genuine piety, and choke the germ of godly feeling and good resolutions, by introducing into the mind so many worldly concerns at the very season when they ought to be most excluded. I am sorry to say that it prevails in in every part of Sweden.

The above-mentioned village church was large, and built of unhewn stone. The paintings of the Apostles, on the front of the gallery, were rude beyond conception; the altar-piece, representing the institution of the Lord's Supper, was in the same style; and the wooden figures of our Lord and his Apostles were in the Finnish costume! There was a large wooden crucifix, and

Continuing my course from the interesting village of Pötles over some well-cultivated grounds, we reached the town of Luisa, a small port, which lies low, surrounded with bare rocks, and contains about 2300 inhabitants. The church, school-house, poor-house, and houses of the inhabitants, are all made of wood. About fifty-five scholars attend the school, whose masters have but very scanty means of support. The population is mostly Swedish, and there is some little commerce. What a difference is apparent between places, whether towns or villages, according as they are inhabited by Finns or by Swedes!

We reached Borga about eleven at night; and I was happy to get a night's rest, after having been two nights deprived of it. I next morning called on the Secretary of the Borga Bible Society, Pastor Bergholm; who introduced me to one of the Directors, Lector Forsius, and another member. They told me that their society was doing its work in a quiet and regular way. They were quite unsupplied with Swedish Bibles; and had written to Stockholm for a quantity, which they prayed me to entreat might be expedited as soon as possible. They had also procured a quantity of Finnish octavo Bibles from Abo, and were preparing to put them into the hands of the peasantry in the surrounding country. One of the gentlemen, a member of the Society, spoke with me on the object of our Institution; and said that it was stillsurmised, by many among them, that the British and Foreign Bible Society had some weighty secret object hidden under the ostensible one, of giving Bibles to the poor. I endeavoured to set this worthy member right as to the simplicity of our object, and the purity of our motives; and stated to him the absolute impossibility that any secret object should exist in a society carried on so publicly, and by men of the most opposite views and interests, both civil and religious.

The number of Swedes in the vicinity of Borga is considerable. They mention five parishes as being chiefly inhabited by them; and in the town of Borga there are 2500 inhabitants, almost all Swedes. The Gymnasium is one of the finest buildings in the place, and has about 100 students: attached to it is a Latin School, with two teachers and about fifty scholars. Borga is the residence of the bishop. The cathedral is of stone, and situated in a high part of the town: a wooden church stands near it, where service is performed in Swedish and Finnish alternately.

The number of births in 1815 was eighty-two, of which twenty-two were illegitimate! in 1818, eighty-five, and thirteen illegitimate. In the diocese of Borga, in 1817, the proportion of children born out of wedlock in the country was one in nineteen; and in the towns, one in six: in the See of Abo, every twentieth in the country—and in the towns, every sixth.

I left Borga at midday; and after travelling two stages, through a well cultivated country, reached Sibha, where I resolved to leave the great road along the coast, and cross through the country to Abo. This course, by carrying me into the interior, would give me a better idea of its productions, and of the state of its inhabitants. In the hut of the peasant where I changed horses, I found a copy of the Bible in Swedish. Though a common peasant, he took a piece of paper and wrote down, with much ease and exactness, the names of the villages, through which I had to pass.

In every country, I have observed that good roads and fenced fields are marks of very considerable advancement in civilization. In Finland, which contains an abundance of forest, these fences are easily put up: in other countries, in Malta for instance, and in my native Scotland, stone and turf are used to indicate a value set on the property by its possessor, and a knowledge of the advantages arising from enclosure. In uncivilized nations, very few indications of this kind are to be seen; for the uncultivated mind is unconcerned about to-morrow.

From Sibho we took the road for Vectles. surprised, after driving forty or fifty miles into the interior of the country, to find so many indications of culture—the corn fields well laid out—the pasturage marked off—the winter crop in bloom—the summer crop covering the clod; and, in the interval between sowing and hay-making, the peasantry, almost in every district, busily engaged in repairing the high roads. These, in general, are almost as good as our English roads, quite level, and covered with gravel and sand; only they are very narrow, insomuch that, in many parts, two ordinary carriages cannot pass. But I forget myself—these roads are made for their own convenience, and not for that of strangers. The only carriage used in Finland is a small two-wheeled car, drawn by one horse; which is made in the form of a gig, and narrow, so that two of them can easily pass each other on their narrow roads.

After repeatedly visiting the huts of the Finnish peasants, I find that, in general, they are great strangers to the comforts of cleanliness: in this respect, their huts are even inferior to the izba of the poorest Russian. It is difficult to reconcile the general appearance of order and propriety in their fields and roads, and even in the external appearance of their houses, with this internal filth and disorder of every kind. Perhaps their rulers contribute greatly towards the former, but have no controul over the latter. Their poverty may help to account for it;—they are poor, and oppressed. And yet in the houses of peasants who seemed to be in more easy circumstances, there was not a bench clean enough to sit down on: and when I looked into their couches early in the morning, and saw the poor children lying no cleaner than their domestic animals, it was impossible not to desire an improvement in their household economy, proportioned to their attainments in husbandry.

I have never, during all my travels, been at such loss for want of language, as in the two or three days that I travelled in the heart of Finland. I did not understand a syllable of what the people spoke, nor did they comprehend a word of what I said. It was rare to find a person who spoke Swedish (with such a one I could converse); and still rarer, one who knew a few words of Russ. Every thing, therefore, was transacted through the medium of signs; in which my young Russian servant was very clever, and sometimes amused me not a little by his ingenuity in making the people understand what he wanted.

Some parts of the country are very beautiful, particularly around the lakes, where the heights are covered with the golden-leaved silver pine; than which, at this season of the year, I know not a tree of richer colours. The cypress and olive of the Athenian groves are not to be compared with them for beauty.

The Finns differ in character from the Russians. hey are phlegmatic and cold in their intercourse; yet neere, and possessed of good mental parts. They selom give vent to their feelings, except when provoked, and in matters of religion, where their zeal is as a burning flame. They are short in stature, stout, and healthy in appearance; have fair hair and eyes, and are usually small-featured.

They were converted to the Christian religion by the Swedes, whose canonized king, Erick IX., about the year 1155, had a principal hand in spreading Christianity along the south and south-west coast of Finland, and in planting Swedish colonies among them. In the year 1293, the whole of Finland was subject to the Swedes; and from that time, Christianity continued gradually to spread among them. With Sweden, at the Reformation, the Finns readily threw off the yoke of Rome, and became followers of Luther.

For some years past there has been an extensive religious awakening among the Finnish peasantry, in the government of Wyborg and Petersburg, principally through the extensive circulation of the Holy Scriptures and of Religious Tracts. The peasants have established meetings, in which they read the Scriptures, sing hymns, and pray. The pastors, being very generally Neologians, persecute them in every possible way on this account; and this tends not a little to increase their numbers. It is to be lamented that excesses of feeling have broken out among them. A cunning, designing fellow, of the name of Michael, introduced the folly of jumping, and other violent bodily gesticulations, into some of their religious meetings. Attempts have been made, by the Protestant Bishop of St. Petersburg, to prevail on them to lay aside these absurdities; yet they have not been everywhere equally successful. Similar practices are said to have prevailed among this people forty years ago. According to the descriptions given of these violent bodily agitations, they seem to be

We continued our course through the night, amidst many fears of being overturned, in consequence of the horses being unused to run three abreast, and the drivers to guide them in such a narrow track. A gracious Providence, however, protected us; and after many hair-breadth escapes, between Tavishûs and Abo, we reached the great road at Somera about three o'clock in the afternoon. At one of the stations, an aged man, having received a rude reply from a young peasant who was yoking the horses, broke out into a violent rage, and struck him several times on the head, foaming at the mouth like a mad dog!

When we arrived within twenty miles of Abo, we began to meet the country-people returning from the annual fair of that city, which is held for three days. This gave me an opportunity of making my observations on the sobriety of the Finns, as the whole strength of this virtue is put to the test on the peasants leaving a fair. More than 400 gigs or carts passed us during the last two stages. I observed that fewer instances of intoxication were seen in those whom we first met; so that the degree of drunkenness or sobriety might be measured by the later or earlier departure of the countryman from the fair. Among upwards of 1000 who passed us, the great majority were sober, and very decent in their appearance and behaviour. Three or four instances of sottish drunkenness, several of raving intoxication, and a few of staring and staggering wildness, were, however, to be observed as we drew nearer to the city. arrived in Abo a little past midnight, and with some difficulty procured a place in the inn.

stream called Aura, which, though not broad, is navigable for small vessels up to the town. The houses are in general well built, of stone and brick, and covered with Many of the lower ranks live in wooden houses covered with sod or earth. In a climate so far north as Abo, a wooden habitation is, in every respect, preferable to one of stone; for it is always dryer in a wet season, and warmer in a cold one: moreover, the air is purer in a wooden than in a stone building. The frost does not enter the wooden as it does the stone walls. Abo contains about 15,000 inhabitants, of whom one third are Swedes, and the rest Finns, with a few Russian mer-Abo has only one church—the cathedral—an ancient gothic edifice, in which service is performed in Finnish and Swedish. The Russians have also built a church for themselves in Abo, as indeed in most of the towns of Finland. Their churches and schools are regulated according to the rites of the Swedish Church. The University is a new building, finished in 1815, with a Museum of Natural History, and a Library of about 24,000 volumes: there is also a Botanic Garden attached. The Observatory is a fine new circular building, on the top of a high granite rock; whence the view is extensive, over the Gulf of Bothnia, and the bare rocks of the neighbourhood. This University is conducted, in all respects, according to the rules of the Swedish Universi-It was founded by Queen Christina; whose bust, with that of the Emperor Alexander, graces the Hall of Assembly. The number of Professors is about twenty, nearly all of them Finns, with salaries of about 120l. per annum; each of whom has also an adjunct. From 200 to 300 students attend their lectures, which are given in the Swedish language. The palace of the Archbishop is of wood. They have an Economical Society, which was founded in 1797, and which has been of singular utility to the country, in promoting vaccination, and the cultivation of flax and potatoes, and in improving the breed of cattle, sheep, &c. Potatoes were first known among the Finns about the middle of the last century: they are now cultivated throughout the whole country, and even among the Laplanders; and have proved of great service when the crops fail, which is often the case in northern regions. Abo is said to be unhealthy, on account of its low and damp situation. The number of deaths in the course of a year is frequently greater than that of births.

The President of the Bible Society, Archbishop Tengström, was gone to his country-seat, about twenty versts out of town, and was not expected back again in less than a month. The Vice-President, Mr. Pomel, spoke very highly of the President, and of the zeal and order which he manifests in carrying forward the concerns of the institution.

I visited the Printing-office of the Society, and found them composing the last pages of the Finnish Quarto Bible. This edition consists of 7500 copies: it will be much sought after, as it has the summaries at the heads of chapters, and the parallel passages: both of these are wanting in the standing-type Finnish Bible, which, on that account, is not in repute among the common people. Moreover, the type is very small in the octavo, but large and clear in the quarto. The octavo will serve well for a School Bible: they have printed 3000 copies of it, and 10,000 Testaments. The paper of both editions is rather of a low quality. In the Printing-office they have four presses, which are occasionally employed in printing other works.

^{*} Archbishop Tengström afterwards informed me, by letter, in 1827, that Abo had been nearly reduced to ashes, by a fire which had consumed 900 of the 1000 houses of which it is composed. Eleven thousand inhabitants

There are among the Finns many learned men; by whom the language is now cultivated more than at any previous period. Provost Renwell has published an improved Dictionary, and I. Juden a Grammar; and they have several periodical Journals. The Finnish Professors generally maintain that their language, which exists in many dialects among the various tribes of Russia and Siberia, has most affinity with the Hungarian; yet this affinity appears to be but slender, as may easily be ascertained by comparing a few passages of the Bible in these languages. The first book printed in Finnish was the New Testament, by Agricola, bishop of Abo; which was printed in Stockholm in 1558. Among the peasantry, schools of any kind are rarely met with: the parents, generally, are the instructors of their own children, who are taught to read in their Hymn-books and Bibles, and to learn the Catechism by heart, all of which is necessary to Confirmation. The population of the seven provinces or districts, into which Finland is now inhabitants were thereby left without house or home. The archbishop adds: "It grieves me to the heart to inform you, that all the Bibles and Testaments, and other property belonging to the Finnish Bible Society, including the stereotype-plates for the Bible, have become a prey to the flames, to the amount of 70,000 roubles; and thus Finland is at once deprived, and that for many years to come, of all access to that light and comfort which the Bible alone can afford!" In order to meet this distressing case, the British and Foreign Bible Society commissioned me, in 1828, to get an edition of 5000 Finnish Testaments printed for them; to which they added a grant of 500 Swedish Testaments. The city is now rebuilding, and the Bible Society again in active operation; so that, as I was informed by a letter from the archbishop in the summer of 1832, they had published a new edition of their Finnish Bible in quarto, and had also an edition of 10,000 octavo Testaments in the press.

Finland is governed by a Senate, which has its seat at Helsingfors, and consists of fifteen members, with the General-governor at their head. They have merely a

- * The following Fourteen Tribes are also of Finnish origin, and are scattered over the Russian empire:
- 1. The Laplanders, who probably were one people with the Finns before the latter became Christians. They live in the Government of Archangel, and consist of about 60,000 souls: most of them profess the Protestant religion. The British and Foreign Bible Society printed an edition of 5000 Testaments for the Laplanders in Sweden and Russia, in Stockholm, in 1811: nearly all of these have since been circulated, principally by the Stockholm Bible Society.
- 2. The Ijortsi, who inhabit Ingrie, or the Government of St. Petersburg.
- 3. The Esthonians, inhabiting the districts of Revel and Dorpat. They speak two Finnish dialects; in both of which, as has been stated, large editions of the Testament have been printed for them by the Russian Bible Society. They belong to the Lutheran Communion; as do also,
 - 4. The Livonians.
- 5. The Votiaks, who inhabit the Governments of Orenburg and Viatka: they consist of about 100,000 souls. The greater part of them belong to the Greek Church; but many of the rites of Heathenism are still prevalent among them. The Four Gospels have been translated into their language, but not printed.
- 6. The Tscheremises inhabit the Government of Kazan and Simbirsk, along the banks of the Wolga and Kama, as far as Perma. They are reckoned at about 50,000 souls: some of them are still idolaters, but the greater part belong to the National Church. The Testament has been translated into their language, and 3000 copies printed for them, by the Kazan Bible Society.
- 7. The Tschuvashes, who live in the Government of Nijnia-Novogorod, Kazan, and Orenburg, and are more numerous than the Tscheremises. They profess Christianity; and have also for the first time, through the Kazan Bible Society, received 5000 copies of the Testament in their own dialect.
 - 8. The Mordvinians live on the banks of the Oka and Wolga.

deliberative authority, and stand in immediate relation with the Emperor. Under the Senate are five departments: 1. Public security and order; 2. Finance; 3. Revenue; 4. Military; and 5. Ecclesiastical. The Though professed Christians, yet they are strongly attached to their ancient idolatrous practices. They are still a pretty numerous tribe; and these also for the first time have received 3000 copies of a version of the New Testament in their vernacular tongue.

- 9. The Permians inhabit the Government of the same name, towards the White Sea and the banks of the Dwina. They were formerly considered the most civilized of the Finnish tribes, and carried on a considerable commerce by land and sea. The Russians planted the Christian religion among them in the fourteenth century. St. Etienne is said to have converted the whole tribe in twenty-four years. But, in the present day, this people are nearly melted down into the Russian mass, whose language they now speak; and have lost their distinction as a tribe of Finnish origin.
 - 10. The Vogouls, in the Governments of Perma and Tobolsk;—and
- 11. The Ostiaks, on the banks of the Jenisci and Obi, compose two numerous heathen tribes of Siberia: these also are supposed to be of Finnish origin, though their dialects are said to have but little in common with those of the other tribes.
- 12. The Teptiars are a mixture of Tscheremises, Tschuvashes, and Mordvinians, who, refusing to submit to the Russians on the fall of the kingdom of Kazan, fled towards the Ural, where they now compose a distinct tribe of about 35,000 souls. They profess Mohammedism.
- 13. The Zerians inhabit the district of Oustiougveliki, in the Government of Vologda: they are also found in the Governments of Perma and Tobolsk. Their language, which they still preserve, is said to resemble the Permian. They were converted to the Christian religion in the fourteenth century, by St. Etienne, who is said to have translated the Scriptures and other Church books into their language; of which, however, not a vestige is known to exist. The Russian Bible Society has translated and printed the Gospel of St. Mathew for this little tribe.
- 14. The Karelians are a small tribe, which principally inhabit the Government of Volonetz, towards the White Sea. One half of them profess the Lutheran religion, and the rest that of the Greek Church. For this tribe, also, the Gospel of St. Matthew has been translated, and 1000 copies printed by the Russian Bible Society.

tribunal of justice, and the criminal tribunal, have full executive power; but all capital punishments must receive the sanction of the sovereign. All civil transactions, in the courts, &c., are conducted in the Swedish language. APPENDIX.

I subjoin the following Sermons, as an Appendix to this Volume, on account of their containing specimens of the style of preaching which prevails among the Clergy of Russia; and also because they throw considerable light upon the character of the people, and on the moral state of the country at large. The characteristic description given, for example, in the two first discourses, by the present Archbishop of Kazan, is, in a great measure, taken from the state of society around The discourses shew also their manner of teaching the leading doctrines of the Gospel, and their general views of saving truth.—I need only add, that I have endeavoured to give a faithful version from the Russo-Slavonic originals; and that the two last discourses, by Michael, late Metropolitan of Novogorod and St. Petersburg, were translated into English by the Princess Sophia Mestchersky.

SERMON I.

BY AMBROSIUS, PRESENT ARCHBISHOP OF KAZAN.

REVELATION XIV. 13.

AND I HEARD A VOICE FROM HEAVEN, SAYING UNTO ME, WRITE, BLESSED ARE THE DEAD WHICH DIE IN THE LORD, FROM HENCEFORTH: YEA, SAITH THE SPIRIT, THAT THEY MAY REST FROM THEIR LABOURS; AND THEIR WORKS DO FOLLOW THEM.

On this festal day we commemorate the death of the immaculate Virgin Mary. Her death we denominate falling asleep; because the death of the just on earth is the beginning of his rest in eternity; and his death-bed is like an evening couch, on which he shall rest until the everlasting morning of immortality, when the Sun of righteousness shall no more go down upon him.

Yes, beloved brethren,—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours:" and "though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in rest:" Wisd. iv. 7. The present life is but the dawn of the great day of eternity; and our existence here on earth is the first step to our everlasting existence! This mortal, with which we are clothed, shall at last put on immortality; and this corruptible, with which we are burdened, shall put on incorruption. O man! thou art immortal! Raise thine eyes towards heaven! yonder is thy home. The earth is but the scene of thy pilgrimage! Encompass eternity with thy mental powers, if thou canst! Yonder is the place of thy habitation! Time is only the beginning of thy course towards an eternal country. The comforts of this life do not compose thy blessedness: they are only a kind of agreeable valley in the journey of life, in which, like a wearied traveller, thou tarriest for a while, that thou mayest with the greater speed hasten to thy native country. The thorns of life, with which thy way is beset, are not intended merely to wound thee in thy course; but to put thee in continual remembrance, that the place of thy rest is not in this world.

O man! thou art immortal!—time flieth, and, in its flight, carries thee upon its wings, even against thy will, to the place of thy destination—to eternity! Years, days, and hours, like a mighty stream, flow perpetually, and bear thee down along with them; like a powerful river, carrying upon its surface the winged vessel to the deep ocean—to eternity! We are all, beloved brethren, we are all destined for eternity! Let us then cast our eyes, for a few moments, on this eternity, and consider how comforting it is to the righteous man, and how terrible it is to the ungodly!

Eternity!—a word incomprehensible by the finite mind of man. Only the Eternal Mind can comprehend its extent! I heap up age upon age, and thousands of years upon thousands of years, and reckon up the times and years of all that is under the sun; but all this is not eternity. This is an unfathomable ocean, whose shores the mortal eye cannot reach! this is an abyse, ss to the eye of all that is created! When the shall become old, and shall be folded up like a;—when the sun shall be darkened, like a coal tinguished;—when the stars shall fall from the like the autumnal leaves from the trees;—when all tribes and nations shall fall before the scythe of time, like the grass that is mown down by the husbandman;—when the earth shall have passed away, and time, laden with years, shall fall before the throne of the Eternal who created it;—yet these do not make up one drop of the fathomless deep of eternity! It is beginning without end; extent without limits; time without time; life without death! There, a thousand years are as one day, and one day as a thousand years. There, a moment is as eternity, and eternity as a moment. There rolls an age which shall remain the same, and its years shall have no end! Such is eternity, my beloved brethren! and down the river of time, into this boundless ocean, we are all hastening! Such is eternity! and into this endless existence we are all running, through the short paths of this life! Such is eternity! and into this land of immortality we must all enter by the gate of death! O gate of triumph for the sons of glory, through which they shall pass, that they may receive the crowns of endless bliss! O gate, awful for the sons of perdition, through which they shall also pass, but in order that they may drink, to the last drop, the cup of heavenly wrath! So, beloved brethren, the righteous enter this gate like conquering warriors, that they may triumph in their victories—that they may rest for ever in the bosom of eternity, after the struggle with their enemies—with an adulterous and sinful world —with the flesh which warreth against the spirit—with their corrupt passions, which struggle within them all the days of their lives, and lead them "captives to the law of sin!" But the wicked enter this gate like criminals condemned to death—like victims led to the slaughter; as enemies of God, preparing to stand before the bar of vindictive justice; or like the servant called to give an

In order that we, beloved brethren, may have an idea of the triumph of the righteous, on his entering the gate of eternity, and of the terror of the wicked, led away by the hand of death to the place of his condemnation, let us for a while approach their death-beds, and hearken to their last conversation.

'And thus I leave the world, this vale of my pilgrimage,' saith the righteous. 'The earthly tabernacle of my body is shaking, and is ready for its fall. Well! I shall the sooner take possession of my mansion which is eternal in the heavens. Death is at the door; but I knew that it was never far from me. I part with the world, and all its enchanting beauties. Oh! if in the prime of life I saw that the world is "vanity of vanities," much more clearly do I now see that the world is a shadow, a dream that passeth away! I have finished my course here on earth; I have now passed the way The time of temptation is now at an end: the stumbling-blocks which the world laid before my heart exist no more for me; the unceasing war with my lusts and passions is now over: the middle wall of partition between me and heaven is tumbling down: the fetters of the flesh, with which I was burthened, are now falling off; and the prison, in which I have so long lingered, is breaking down. I hasten to the liberty of the sons of God. The everlasting doors are opening! Enter, O my soul, into thy rest! The way of the cross, which thou hast so often watered with tears of grief, and on which the voice of groanings, which cannot be uttered, has so often been heard;—the way of the cross, which thou hast everywhere found strewed with thorns;—the way of the cross, for which the joyful sons of this world have so often mocked thee—this way of the cross has at last brought thee to the gates of heaven. I give up the world, and receive heaven: I leave my fellow men, my brethren, and I enter the habitations of angels: I leave my friends on earth, and go to my Jesus, the friend of mankind, in heaven: I leave the comforts of this life, which were sometimes mixed in my cup of suffering that my strength might not fail in my course, to be received into the bosom of my eternal Father, and take my place among his elect: I leave temporal comforts, that I may be filled with the fulness of the household of God, and drink of the streams of bliss which flow for ever in the abodes of the just. art thou still cast down, O my soul! and why art thou disquieted within me? What! thou tremblest at the sight of thy fall;—but thou art also sealed with the seal of holy repentance. Thou feelest terror, standing at the door of the righteous Judge;—but thou art also redeemed with the blood of thy Jesus, for whose sake our heavenly Father bestoweth upon us all things. Thou faintest on entering the dark valley of death;—but faith is thy light, with which thou shalt pass through the shadow of death. Oh trust in God! He that spared not his own Son, for thy sake, how shall he not with him also freely give thee all things? He who blotted out the hand-writing of thy sins, nailing it to his ignominious cross, how shall he not also shield thee from the arrows of Divine justice, by his glorious cross?'

With these comfortable feelings the virtuous man lies down upon his death-bed, in order to take from it his flight to the eternal mansions. Great God! with what light is the countenance of a departing saint illuminated, amidst the thickest darkness of death! With what sweet feelings does the hope of eternity fill his soul, when, to the view of man, all hope of life is past! His faith receives new strength, and his love additional ardour. 'Ye everlasting doors,' he sings, 'be ye opened Sun of righteousness, that shall never set, dart upon me the first ray of everlasting light, that the darkness of life may cease, in which I dimly beheld thee, as through a glass!—then shall I behold thee face to face. Lord Jesus, as thou didst teach me to trust in thee while upon earth, receive my spirit, that I may depart in peace and obtain rest! Now, now, O Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace! for mine eyes have beheld thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all thy people living upon earth, who in peace and patience wait for the fulfilment of thine unutterable promises.'—Behold the manner in which the righteous man dies!

But not so, beloved brethren—not so do those depart who forget God! Whither is the view of the dying sinner directed?—towards the world, in which he thought to have erected for himself an everlasting tabernacle of bliss!—the world, which he loved so passionately, and without which he could not be happy, no not But, ah! the world vanishes from his for an hour! eyes—the world hastens from his death-bed—the world forgets him! 'Deceitful world!' he exclaims, 'was it for this that I served thee so zealously, satisfied thee so unweariedly, strove to please thee so willingly? I embraced the chains which thou didst lay upon me, and divided my soul between thee and heaven; I sacrificed my conscience to thee, and loved thee more than God; and now thou leavest me, to fall into the hands of an offended God, against whom, to please thee, I have so often sinned! O ungrateful world! soon, soon shalt thou forget me, like the hard-hearted householder, who feedeth his servants only in the days of their strength, that he may enrich himself by their labours; and leaveth them, in the midst of killing hunger, when their strength has failed!'

Should he turn his eyes upon his treasures, over which he stood a watchful guard all the days of his life, he sees that he must part with them. 'O deceitful gold!' he exclaims, 'in thee I placed my only bliss! not thou that didst cost me so much labour—so much injustice, with which, for thy sake, I have burthened my soul—so many tears, which, for thee, I have caused my neighbours to shed—so much oppression and violence against the widow and the orphan—the ruin of so many families, whom for thy sake I have reduced to poverty, by unlawful gambling, unjust judgments, usury, and the abuse of powers committed to me for the good of I was a judge, and for thy sake I promy brethren? nounced unmerciful and unrighteous judgments. I was appointed a guardian of the laws, and I broke their sanctity as soon as thou glitteredst in mine eyes. ordained a leader of the people, to feed them with truth and righteousness; and, for thy sake, I myself set them an example of bribery, being a receiver of the wages of unrighteousness:—even to those who stood under me in office, I taught the ways of injustice, for the sake The period of my rule was a scene of unjust plunder, unheard-of discords, and unlawful license. I was a householder, and for thee, O gold! I suffered my servants to perish through hunger. I was a father, and, to preserve thee, I suffered my children to grow up without education. Yes! I have done every thing for thee; but the threatening looks of Death now teach me that I heaped up riches not knowing for whom I gathered them.—O cursed gold! for thee I have done all this; and, behold! now I leave thee, and know not to whom;—perhaps to unthankful heirs, who, spending thee upon their vanities, luxurious tables, and wicked lusts, shall, in the midst of their mirth, laugh at my avarice—perhaps to strangers, whose very name is to me unknown—perhaps to mine enemies, on whom I would not have bestowed a single mite. Yes! I leave thee—in grief I leave thee. And what do I carry with me into eternity?—a conscience burthened with injustice, a soul loaded with curses—curses, the voice of which shall pierce me throughout eternity—a heart nailed to thee, which, contrary to my will, Death tears from thee. O cursed gold! thou hast made me eternally miserable!'

Does he turn his eyes towards his titles and honours? 'Now, at last, my titles, of which I was so proud, vanish,' says he, 'and the distinctions of which I boasted are extinguished at the brink of my grave! At last, my rank and titles, for which I have laboured so much, suffered so many vexations, cringed so low, must be laid aside! All the high-sounding names, with which vanity has adorned me, or which low flattery has trumpeted in my ears, leave me at the gates of eternity, and the name of sinner alone accompanies me thither. True, on my tomb earthly flattery will engrave my titles; but shall I be judged by these titles in eternity? Eloquent falsehood will twine wreaths of praise over my grave; but will these praises be heard yonder, where naked truth shall judge me? A hand bought with gold will write my name in the annals of the world; but what is an earthly monument to me, when my name shall not be found written in the Book of Life, and I shall be sealed with the seal of condemnation? Alas! time was when I had a great title—the title of a Child of God; but I have erased it by iniquity, and willingly have I borne the name of sinner. I had a distinguished calling—the calling of a Christian; but I have willingly rejected it. I was signed with the sign of the promise of eternal life—insignia, superior to all the dignities of the world; but I have erased these, for the shadows and dreams of a wicked life. Go, then, sinful soul, into the presence of Jesus, thy Judge! These great titles, instead of being signs of thy salvation, are, through thine own fault, become the cause of thy condemnation.'

Again, he turneth his eyes upon his body which he so much pampered and gratified: 'O mouldering tabernacle,' exclaimed he, 'which with such labour I have supported and preserved—thou returnest now into thy dust! Full tables, choice meats, and well-flavoured wines were all prepared for thee: for this purpose, I contracted debts that cannot now be paid; I ruined the orphan and the stranger; I took from the helpless the last farthing; I robbed, oppressed, sold my conscience, all in order to feed, warm, pamper, and satisfy thee:—and what do I now see?—soon, very soon shalt thou become a breathless corpse, food for the worms, a handful of dust! O wretched tabernacle! was it for thee that I laboured so much?—for thee that I transgressed?—for thee, that I forgot my eternal mansion in the heavens?'

But let us shorten this sorrowful scene, my brethren; and let us only notice how the sinner, in his last moments, turns his eyes towards heaven—towards eternity. The hour is now come, says he, 'when I must leave the world and my treasure, and enter into eternity! Already my eyes become dim;—already I feel the grasp of the cold hand of Death, that is come to lead me into the valley of darkness—a land to me unknown. Yes; Faith offered me her lamp, to enlighten the horrid darkness of the tomb; but I extinguished this lamp, by unbelief. Grace stretched out her hand, to lead me into the regions of eternity; but I thrust her hand from me. My heavenly Father continually offered me His bosom; but I have preferred the embraces of sin. I go to the abodes of eternity — Oh, how gloomy is my path!— Yonder is God!—He is my vindictive Judge. Here is conscience!—she is my accuser, not to be bribed. Yonder is the fire that never shall be quenched, the worm that never dieth! yonder is eternal gnashing of teeth—impenetrable darkness! Oh, these are all fit rewards for me, a sinner!' Thus he exclaims; and his eyes begin to stare—his countenance is covered with a ghastly paleness -his features become distorted-his lips are locked in silence; and his agonized soul breaks through the chinks of the dissolving tabernacle, to fall into the hands of the Living God, the punisher of unrighteousness.

'Alas! where is he now?' exclaim his relations, who surround his death-bed. — Where is he now, beloved brethren? He is in eternity; he is there, where his lot shall never be changed — where the just sentence pronounced against him shall eternally remain, and never be revoked. Hence, beloved brethren, it is written, that "horrible is the end of the unrighteous generation;" but though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in rest:"—Wisd. iii. 19. iv. 7.

But having attended the death-bed both of the righteous and of the wicked, let us follow them as far as we can—into eternity itself, whither they have both entered by the gate of death. He who holdeth the keys of the everlasting doors in his hand, proclaims to us concerning the righteous—"And the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." The soul, then, of the godly, on leaving this mortal body, and being freed from the captivity and slavery of the flesh, thus laying aside her mouldering habitation, is carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom; or rather into the eternal bosom of the Lord himself, whom she served. There, the tears of her sufferings, shed upon earth, are for ever dried up. There, her groans on account of the continuance of her pilgrimage in the world are exchanged for the songs of Seraphim. There dwelleth joy unutterable—bliss, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, but which God hath laid up for them that love him. There dwells joy without grief—life without death —light without darkness—bliss without sorrow. There God is all, and in all. There mortals are clothed with glory and immortality—nourished with the bread of heaven—and made to drink of the sweet streams of everlasting happiness, at the supper of the Lamb. Behold the eternity of the just!

Alas! how different is the lot of the wicked! Let us hearken how the holy word describes it. Eternal flames, kindled by the justice of heaven, receive him; and he shall eternally contend with these flames, and yet never be consumed. The sacrifice is eternally burning, and is still renewed out of its own ashes, for everlasting consumption. Tears for ever flow from the eyes of the miserable, yet do not quench these flames. His groans echo in the pit of utter darkness, yet none attend to the sighs of his woe. In vain he expects the end of his sufferings; for eternity is the only measure of his torments. Eternal remorse tortures him, like a worm that never dieth;—but remorse comes too late in hell. Everlasting pangs of conscience, like a serpent, sting his memory; but repentance, or a change, is now impossible.

'And thus my short life on earth,' says the soul of the damned, 'is finished!—O past life! was it for this that thou wast given me, that I might ruin myself? At the very threshold of that life, an eternal kingdom was placed before me; but I rejected it. In the very dawn of life, I was illumined by the light of the Gospel, that I might at length see light everlasting, unfading in the heavens: but I hated this light, because my deeds were evil. From my mother's womb I was sealed with the seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost, and washed in the bath of regeneration, and I vowed that I would be a pure sacrifice unto the Lord; but I have erased that seal, that I might stamp myself with the seal of the beast which ascendeth out of this bottomless pit in which I am now tormented. The cup of heavenly mercy, filled with the blood of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world—blood sanctifying, saving, bestowing eternal life—this cup was all my life long offered to me; and I ate and drank of it to my condemnation; but not to eternal life, because I discerned not the Lord's body in it. The minister of the Lord, with the lamp of faith in his hand and the sword of the word in his mouth, made known unto me the way of salvation; but I shut my ears against it, and ran from the temple where the Lord was preached, that I might not hear His voice; or, when decorum brought me to the temple of God, I stood at as great a distance as possible, that the words of the preacher might not enter my soul. He accused me, in order to amend me; and I thought that he designed to calumniate me. He warned me by the word of life; but I foolishly concluded that he sought my ruin. With sighs he sought my salvation; but I conceived that his attempts to draw me from the paths of vice were to lead me from the ways of happiness. The arms of my Heavenly Father were all day long stretched out to receive me, and his voice continually sounded in my conscience; "Come now, and let us reason together! Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool;"—but I fled from the arms of eternal love, and hearkened not to the tender voice of my parent. Thus, for these gifts of grace despised, I am tormented in this flame. I had reason given to me, that I might understand "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." But in what pursuits did I employ my reason?—in diabolical intrigues, in weaving nets of iniquity to entangle the feet of my neighbours, or fascinating wiles to make if possible the very elect stumble — in devising false pretexts on the seat of justice, in order to deprive the innocent of his right, and to justify the guilty. I had a susceptible heart given me, that I might love the Lord my God above all, and my neighbour as myself; but I made of it a den of corrupt lusts and passions. Thus the gifts of nature were destroyed; and here I am tormented in this flame! I had great wealth in my hands: Oh, how easily might I have purchased therewith "treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust corrupt, and thieves do not break through and steal"!—but I have spent it among gluttons and drunkards, in destructive vanities, in sinful amusements, in noisy mirth, or in gratifying unlawful passions. I stood on the pinnacle of honour; but the higher I stood, the deeper have I dug the pit into which I am now fallen. On the summit of fortune, power, and might, I was like a bloodthirsty idol, devouring sacrifices drunk with the sweat and blood of those who fell down before me. Thus were the gifts of fortune wasted; and hence I am tormented in this flame!— Oh, when shall these sufferings come to an end? Never!

never! Comfort and life are fled from me, like lightning; and, behold, an eternal cloud of darkness covers me! The sweets of life were but as a drop of honey in my mouth; and, behold, the eternal bitterness of torment remains with me for ever, for ever!—Oh, eternity! eternity! Oh, my soul! my soul!

Beloved brethren! my speech fails beneath the weight of the horrors of the sinner, in the place of his damnation; and my eyes are wearied at the sight of his sufferings. I am unable, at present, to say more to you concerning his miseries; and shall only add, that I fear for you, lest his lot become yours, should death find you walking in his ways. Be not deceived, ye that forget God!—God is not mocked; for except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

SERMON II.

BY AMBROSIUS, PRESENT ARCHBISHOP OF KAZAN.

ON GOOD-FRIDAY, 1814.

1 CORINTHIANS I. 23.

WE PREACH CHRIST CRUCIFIED, UNTO THE JEWS A STUMBLING-BLOCK, AND UNTO THE GREEKS FOOLISHNESS; BUT UNTO THEM WHICH ARE CALLED, BOTH JEWS AND GREEKS, CHRIST, THE POWER OF GOD, AND THE WISDOM OF GOD.

And thus, innocence is delivered up to death, and the work of guilty man's reconciliation with God is accomplishing! The Lamb, bearing the sins of the world, is slain upon the altar of the cross; and the Sacrifice which taketh away sin, offered up to the justice of heaven! The wrath of an angry Father pierces with arrows his only Son; and children of wrath are again reckoned among the number of the children of God! He who knew no sin is made to be sin for transgressors; and transgressors are redeemed from the curse of the law! Light everlasting is arising on the tomb, and those who sat in darkness see a great light! Jesus suffers, and dies! and he bears our sins upon himself, is bruised for our iniquities, and by his stripes we are healed!—All-gracious! All-merciful! how unsearchable are thy judgments, and thy ways and counsels past finding out! O believing soul! this dying Jesus is thy righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Should conscience, harrowed up by the workings of sin, threaten thee with vindictive justice, behold the sacrifice which cleanseth the contrite spirit from dead, works! behold Jesus, who, having nailed the handwriting of thy sins to his cross, took it away! If the wicked world still strive to entangle thee in its nets; if the light of thy reason become dim, amidst the darkness which covers these sublunary regions; if thy soul be still subject to vanity, though not willingly; and if sin work in thy mortal body—behold a true and heavenly Teacher! His lips, though sealed in the silence of death on the cross, still proclaim the will of his eternal Father to his brethren in the midst of the Church. His law is perfect; his commandments are pure, enlightening the eyes; his testimony is sure, making wise the simple; he is the true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world; and they that follow him shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. If thy desires, drawn away by sensual objects, cleave to the earth, and the ray of immortality in thee appear to be extinguished, behold the Resurrection and the Life! With him, on thy death-bed, thou shalt triumph over death and corruption. Thus Jesus is made of God unto us, "the power of God, and the wisdom of God."

But not so to them that perish. He is to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness: for the world by wisdom knew not God. It exclaimed before Pilate, against Jesus, the power of God and the wisdom of God, "Away with him! away with him! crucify him." It pointed at him upon the cross, saying, "Thou that destroyest the Temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself! If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross!" It denominated him, after his death, a cunning deceiver:—"Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again." Thus did the world mock, torture, and kill the incarnate Truth upon the cross! And has it ceased to persecute him in our days? Oh no, beloved brethren! Jesus still continues to be to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness. The world cannot endure the doctrine of Jesus;—and why? Because the Spirit of God is contrary to the spirit of the world, and the doctrines of Jesus are contrary to the doctrines of the world.—Let these, then, be the subject of our present discourse.

I. The SPIRIT OF THE WORLD is the spirit of error and darkness; but the spirit of god is the Spirit of truth and of light: and from the first moment of man's fall, these two have been at open war with each other. From the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zachariah son of Barachias; and from the blood of Zachariah to the blood of the angel of the wilderness, John the Baptist; and from the blood of John, to the blood of Jesus upon the cross—what do we behold?—an uninterrupted series of martyrs to the truth, who were "afflicted and tormented. They wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth—of whom the world was not worthy." What were these men amidst a corrupt and wicked generation? "A spectacle to angels and to men. They hungered and thirsted, and were mocked and buffeted, and had no certain dwelling-place, and were made as the filth of the world, the off-scowering of all things;" despised by all, and spoken against by all.

But did not the world change at last, when the Sun shone upon it from on high; when it was illumined by the light of the knowledge of God from Golgotha; when kings and nations fell prostrate before the cross, and confessed Jesus as their Sovereign Lord and Ruler? Oh no, beloved brethren! the world is still the same.

Who is respected in the world? He who possesses an elegant chariot, who dwells in gilded apartments, whose table is loaded with choice meats, who is clothed in purple and scarlet, within whose dwelling the mirthful voice of guests resounds from the fall of eve to the rising of the sun. It is all one to the world what idol it worships: he may be a robber, a disturber of the public peace, a severe master, an unjust judge, a governor who betrays the public good: this matters not. He is surrounded with the gifts of fortune; he is rich; he makes merry on every holiday; he is sought after by every one, and they all encompass and worship But the friend of virtue, the friend of Jesus, whose glory consists in doing the will of Him who sent him into this world of trials—the Father of Light and Truth—oh, the world has no desire to look into his humble dwelling! He is unskilled to live in the world; for he lives upon that alone which justly belongs to him. He lives not in luxury; for he does not steal. He does not make merry; for he will not live at the expense of his neighbour. He does not grow rich; for he has no desire, by oppression and avarice, to ruin his brother. not foolishly spend his substance; because he accepteth not the wages of iniquity against the innocent. Here now is a man altogether opposed to the taste of the world! If the world, out of mercy, does not persecute him, at least it will not account him worthy of its attention. Who is great in its estimation? The world measures greatness by another measure than that which faith adopts. The greatness of the world is not the greatness of virtue, but the high-sounding deeds of men of high birth, the greatness of ranks and titles.

What causeth the loud-sounding trumpet of fame to be blown before them? Battles won, in which rivers of blood have flowed, and many thousands have been sacrificed to the ambition of one man; cities desolated and reduced to ashes, which formerly exalted their proud heads to heaven; fields and meadows turned into deserts, whose fertility once resembled the plains of Eden; and kingdoms, by death, murder, and devastation, turned into wildernesses, which formerly flourished like the lilies of the field. The Cæsars and Alexanders of the world may be compared to those inauspicious luminaries whose appearance proclaims universal misery; or to those destroying angels whose course was marked with desolation and death: yet the world immortalizes their names, and stamps their deeds with the seal of greatness—a greatness, however, which persecutes the faith, and at which the heart trembles and humanity shrinks!

But is the world not possessed of virtue also! Ah, beloved brethren! what are virtues which have not their seat in the heart; and rest not upon eternity, and upon a God rewarding according to our works? They are like reeds broken by the wind—deceiving lights, which burn no longer than the inflammable matter lasts which fed them—edifices built of and upon the sand, which fall into dust as soon as the wind of adversity blows upon them. Yet the world still speaks of its virtues! But what kind of virtue is preached among them? That you must be a faithful subject, devoted to your country:—and why? because to such virtue, honours and rewards are attached: but should these not be conferred, then you may abandon the service of your country, and live for yourself. That it is necessary to love truth:—and why? because those who love it are universally respected.

That you must strictly adhere to your word, and restore that which you have borrowed: -- wherefore? because a man who does not keep his word forfeits the confidence of every one. That you must do good to others:—and why? because you may need their good services at some future period, or because, at least, this will make your name to be praised. In a word, it is necessary to be, or at least to appear to be, virtuous; and why? because our honour and interest require it. Such is the righteous man of the world! But now draw aside the gaudy veil with which he screens himself from the eyes of men. Oh! then you shall behold "the abomination of desolation, standing in the holy place!" Tear off the gilded ornaments of this shining idol, and you will perceive that his whole being consists of clay. Take self-interest out of the motives of his virtuous deeds, and you shall see in him nothing but wickedness. Give him an opportunity of avenging himself upon his enemy, and of preserving, at the same time, the appearance of an humble condescending man, and he will not let it pass. Shew him a treasure which he may seize, and still preserve his name for being disinterested, and he will not refuse to put it into his coffers. Place him in circumstances in which he may gratify his passions, avoid the punishment of vice, and save appearances before the world, and he will forget the obligations of an honest man. And is this the man whom faith blesses, and on whom God confers happiness—who shall at last be received into the eternal embraces of heaven? Yet these sons of the world dream of merit, and are elated with their virtues. Hearken to them! They profess to be wiser than all; though the wisest of them, according to the flesh, has long since confessed that he knows nothing. They are Most honourable, though their honour is nothing but an empty name, and not that honour which springs from good works: they are Most eminent, though their eminence consists only in ranks and titles, and not in distinguished actions: they are Most virtuous, though their virtues are like nocturnal fires, which, as the day approaches, shew nothing but smoke. What is the language of their mouths? A thanksgiving like this: "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are!" What is in their hearts? Selfcongratulation, like this: "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." They are idols, before whom self-gratification continually offers up her They appropriate all to themselves; and there remains nothing for God. 'Riches, they are mine,' says the worldly man; 'for they are the fruits of my labour. Rank and titles, they are mine; for they are the reward of my merits. Fame, she is also mine; for she has been the constant companion of my actions. Talents, gifts, they are mine; for I am indebted to none for them. Virtues, they are mine; for they are the offspring of my good heart.'—Thus doth the spirit bless itself, which is enchanted with itself! Thus do the sons of the world refer all things to themselves!

But how does Faith address this exalted spirit of pride? "Thou knowest not," saith she, "that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Ambitious man! thou art in love with thine own perfections; but canst thou blindly be proud, when it is clear that thou livest entirely at the mercy of another? With all thy virtues, thou art a sinner. With all thy riches, thou art a beggar. Thou existest; but is not thy life the gift of the Sovereign of Heaven? He openeth his hand, and thou art filled with his goodness. He turneth away his face, and thou returnest to

Thou comest into life; and who leadeth thee by dust. degrees to the age of maturity—from the helplessness of infancy to the impetuosity of youth—and from the impetuosity of youth to manhood? Is it not He, without whom thou canst not "add one cubit to thy stature;" and without whom thou canst not "make one hair of thy head white or black?" Art thou successful in thy pursuits? are thy magazines filled with goods—thy undertakings crowned with success—thy fortune fixed upon stable pillars? and darest thou to view all this as the fruit of thy own exertions, thy wisdom, thy talents? Not so, O man! "The steps of a man are ordered by the Lord:" Psalm xxxvii.23. "He bringeth low, and lifteth up:" 1 Sam. ii.7. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above:" James i. 17. For "what hast thou," O man! "that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?" 1 Cor. iv. 7. Therefore, from head to foot, whether in soul or body, from the mental faculties to the bodily senses, nothing belongeth to thee; they are all the bountiful gifts of an unseen hand:—and why? that thou shouldst be, in all respects, not thine own, but God's. But where is this desire in thee, O man? Thou bearest upon thyself the image of the invisible God; and yet thou hast willingly, though a man, assimilated thyself to the beast. light of truth has shone upon thee; and yet, of thine own choice, thou hast put a veil before thine eyes, that thou mightest walk in darkness. A ray of the glorious Trinity is kindled in thy soul—thy reason—that it might lead thee in all thy undertakings, and guide thee in the way of truth. But what use dost thou make of this luminary?—only to enlighten thee while practising ini-Thou hast received a Table of laws, not made quities. with hands, from an unseen Giver: an invisible finger has engraven its eternal laws upon thy conscience; according to which God will judge thee, and by which thy thoughts accuse, or else excuse, one another. Where then is this monitor? Thou hast sacrificed it before the idols of thy corrupt passions.

Thus Faith accuses the world of pride;—and her accusations wound it. "And knowest thou not, O man! that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked?" Pride desires to appropriate every thing to herself; but Faith divests her of all. Pride desires, for this purpose, to be adorned like an image, at which heaven and earth may wonder, and exclaim, 'Behold the man!' But Faith overthrows this image, and turns it into dust and ashes.

But it is not pride alone which reigneth in the world: "the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes," have also their dominion. The world must needs live according to the will of its own corrupt passions. Behold the springs of its operation! In the inclinations of the heart, behold its motives! For it has no other law than the law of its lusts. It owns no happiness, but the happiness of temporal enjoyment. "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years! take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." This is the world's rule, when Fortune pours her gifts upon it. But when Heaven is less bountiful, when it shuts its liberal hand, then comes another of the world's rules: 'Steal, deceive, oppress, sell thy conscience, and make merry while thou livest.' Thus the child of this present time reasons:—'Let all others suffer, provided only I am merry: let the oppressed water his bread and mingle his drink with weeping; it is all one to me: only let my cup of pleasure be full!' Yea; let those whom he oppresses be clothed in rags, provided he be dressed in the fashion!

Let industrious poverty, in bloody sweat, till an ungrateful soil, and faint with hunger, provided his table Let innocence pine in the be furnished with dainties! dark dungeon!—what time has he to think of that? He has to attend to plays, assemblies, feasts, visits, gambling, and evening parties. Oh! what a multitude of important affairs!—But hast thou then forgotten, O fool! that there is a Judge in the earth? Though the unexpected and awful fall of other sinners like thyself, from the height of fortune to the depths of ruin, should bring no danger to thee—though the whole world should bow and serve thee—though all circumstances should unite in furthering thy oppressions—though rulers and the powers that be, like blinded men, should not behold thy wicked deeds, or, being themselves no better, should take part in thy injustice*—yet, He that formed the eye, shall he not see thy wickedness? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear the cries and groans of those who demand his aid just against thee? and He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know to judge between the helpless and the strong, the oppressed and their oppressor? If, indeed, thou art assured that all thy iniquities upon earth shall pass unpunished, then make merry, increase thy joys by adding new pleasures, hasten to riot and to feasts! But time flies on wings swifter than the quickest whirlwind: and that awful day approaches, when God alone shall be exalted, and all mankind shall be humbled; when the monarch and his slave shall stand together before the judgment-seat; and when works alone shall be put into the balance. "God hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world, and give to every man according to his works: "Acts xvii. 31. Rev. xxii. 12. Ah! what shall then become of thee? "Thou, Lord, art righteous in all thy judgments! The foolish shall not stand in thy sight: thou hatest all workers of iniquity!"

II. Brethren! the holy apostle saith, "Love not the world, neither the things which are in the world: if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him;" and, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." Behold how the world opposeth God! The world makes its own laws for the regulation of its passions: but Faith commands to sacrifice these passions, for they are our domestic enemies—"They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." The world seeks an effeminate and easy life: Faith presents a man with a perpetual cross, as soon as he enters on the Christian race—"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." The world points out to her favourites a broad way, strewed with the flowers of sensual gratification, shaded with variety of amusements, and illuminated by the glare of corrupt passions: Faith points out to her votaries a narrow and sorrowful way—" Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction." The world makes an idol of its possessions, and, displaying them, saith, "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me!" Faith commands—"Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." According to the principles of the world, we must love none but ourselves: according to the rules of faith, we must love God above all, and our neighbour as ourselves—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbour as thyself." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Finally, the world refers all to the present: only on earth it seeks its happiness: riches are the idol to which all its desires are affixed: rank and titles are its greatness, without which it considers itself mean and despised: luxury, amusements, spectacles, feasts, and plays, compose its only happiness. Faith refers all to the future: her riches are riches in heaven—"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust do corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." Her pleasures are eternal pleasures—"I shall be satisfied," saith she, "when I awake with thy likeness," and when I am in possession of those blessings which "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, even the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Now it was this very contrariety between the principles of the world and the principles of Jesus which set the world against him. The world despised Jesus, because Jesus made all the principles of the world despicable. The world rose up against Jesus, because Jesus rose up against all the errors of the world. The world derided, tortured, and slew Jesus on the cross, because Jesus laid open, how insignificant are its glories, how detestable its pleasures, how murderous its dreams, how heavy that cross which the sons of this world are made to carry.

Ah, beloved brethren! behold we stand at the tomb of that crucified Lord Jesus! Shall we abandon him, and say to the world, 'Thou art our God, and beside thee we know no other?' No; we embrace the wounds out of which life flowed unto us. Shall our kisses be like unto that of the perfidious disciple who betrayed Jesus? When the world presents us with its glory, its pleasures, its dreams, shall we, in effect, say to it, "What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you?" Ah! what can the world give us, that shall at all be compared to what we receive with Jesus? Does it offer us glory, and the respect of men? But what glory have we in Jesus? With him, our names are written in heaven; with him, we shall partake of that glory which he had with the Father before the world was; with him, we shall reign for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end! Does the world offer rank and titles? But what title can be higher, than that which we receive by Jesus—Children of God heirs of a kingdom, prepared for the elect from the foundation of the world? If the friends of earthly kings are accounted great, how much greater the friends of If the children of earthly kings are exalted, how much higher are the children of the Lord of heaven and earth! Treasures and riches, O Christian! has not Jesus promised thee treasures superior to the whole world? Thou shalt repose on the bosom of the Almighty in the eternal kingdom, and the glory of the Lord shall encompass thee: heavenly splendors shall crown thy head, and the treasures of eternity shall be displayed before thine eyes: then shall this globe, with all its glories, as they revolve beneath thee, appear less than an imperceptible point: then will the treasures of the world be thought more insignificant than the dust which is driven before the wind: then heaven shall be thine—eternity shall be thine—God himself shall be thine!—Oh what blessedness!

Lord Jesus! to whom shall we go? Thou alone hast

the words of eternal life! Open thou our eyes, that we may behold wondrous things out of thy law! Ah, Saviour! on beholding the blessedness which thou hast prepared for us, we are ready to say, with thy disciple, 'Though we should die with Thee, yet will we not leave Thee!' But our deceitful hearts betray us, and we are continually surrounded with the cares of life; we sink in the sea of vanity. Oh! stretch forth from the tomb thy all-powerful arm, and, as thou didst support thy sinking disciple Peter among the waves of Gennesareth, so sustain us in the midst of this stormy world, and draw us to thy Father; that, after having suffered for a little while with thee on earth, we may with thee in heaven be eternally glorified! Amen!

SERMON III.

BY INNOCENTIUS, LATE BISHOP OF PERM.

PREACHED IN THE KAZAN CHURCH, ST. PETERSBURG, MARCH 12, 1814, ON THE ANNI-VERSARY OF THE ACCESSION OF THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER TO THE THRONE.

PSALM LXXXIX. 27.

I WILL MAKE HIM MY FIRST-BORN, HIGHER THAN THE KINGS OF THE EARTH.

This promise, which was fulfilled to the House of David, is still accomplished on earth, as often as men are chosen according to God's own heart. The Eternal King is not confined to the narrow boundaries of time and place. From the throne of his majesty in the heavens he extendeth his sceptre over all the kingdoms of men. Placing kings upon thrones, he himself reigneth in them, when they commit the reins of their government to Him. He reigneth in his power, when they place no confidence in human strength. He reigneth in his glory, when the earthly sovereign, in deep humility, ascribes all his glory to the Eternal King. Then the invisible kingdom of God becometh visible, in the elevation which the Lord bestows: according to his just decree—"I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth."

Not only are the works of God upon the earth, my brethren, proclaimed to us by the ancients, and written in the books of kings of old; but we are witnesses of them ourselves: we are witnesses of that glory with which the Lord crowns our pious monarch Alexander. On that day when he ascended the throne of Russia, our hopes ascended with him;—but they looked no further than to the enjoyment of security and happiness within the empire. We afterwards saw his throne exalted in glory and power; we compared it with those of his cotemporary sovereigns of the earth; but we did not then perceive his internal elevation. Who does not inwardly confess, that terror filled his heart, when numerous tribes of strangers entered Russia in arms? Who did not shudder within himself, when the whole empire was shaken by the fall of great cities, and its glory obscured by the smoke which ascended from the burning ruins of our towns and villages? Whose eye could then penetrate into futurity, and discern how the enemy, that arose to humble Russia, should become the instrument of its exaltation—how the presumption that despised meekness should be conquered by her in just retribution—and how the power of those very arms, that thought to subdue to themselves the glory of all nations, should prepare before all people a way to glory for a monarch who sought only the glory of God?

The ways of the Lord, though in their commencement hidden from the view of men, and scarcely discernible even by those who are chosen to walk according to them, at last become so evident to all, that even those who are blinded by infidelity perceive the doings of the God of Hosts, in the unexpected changes which exalt or humble the powerful of the earth. "The right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly;" and by it the meek and humble monarch is exalted, so as to become the greatest among the great of the nations: he hath beautified the meek before all, in the deliverance of the nations: he hath fulfilled his word—"I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth."

The height of Divinity cannot be measured by man: nor can the human mind conceive the greatness which may be conferred by God. Yet we ought to know by what means it is obtained, and in what way the power and glory of God descend upon the sovereign, his arms, and his people. And we shall find, that the face of the Lord is turned from us, when our hearts and views are turned from Him.

Retrace the late war—follow at a distance the march of armies: we find it everywhere distinguished by the blood of our brethren, who, at the voice of command, spared not their lives—by the activity of commanders, who knew that every drop of blood falling to the earth would be required at their hands—by the wisdom of a monarch, who, not trusting in the power of man, sought the all-powerful aid of that God, who saveth the upright in heart from the corruptions of the wicked. From thence returning to peaceful habitations, we behold the people melted down in disinterested love, in prayer for the sovereign and their native land; and sacrificing not only the superfluities of their property, but the whole of their possessions. The hope of temporal reward could not have animated to such acts, neither could the love of glory have given such energy to their hearts and arms: it was zeal for the defence of justice, and a desire to obtain peace to their peaceable country-He who, in such wonderful events as these, can discern the finger of God upon the earth, will be able to understand how the fidelity of a people to their sovereign and their country, supported by his piety and fidelity towards God, must exalt both the sovereign and the nation.

The true elevation and solid greatness of a nation is a mystery, which the rulers of the earth have ever sought to understand: sometimes they have, for a brief period, truly appreciated, attained, and enjoyed it; more frequently, while rejoicing in its supposed maturity, they have found it to be nothing but a shadow. Even to this day, many think to raise their people to the highest degree of elevation by following the taper of their own reason; but, by this means, they have only led them to the very brink of ruin, into which they themselves, like their predecessors, have been launched, in the sight of their people. According to the judgment of man, the true elevation of an earthly kingdom consists in having wise laws, to which all are submissive—in possessing abundance of riches, and men of highly-cultivated understandings—in having gained many victories, and extended the limits of dominion. But let us open the volume of man's existence upon the earth. There we behold the names of great kingdoms written: but their reputed magnitude remains only a monument of human vanity and of the instability of nations. Moreover, the word of God assures us, that whatsoever is built by the power of man is built upon the sand; and, in its very elevation, is only preparing for a fall, which will be great in proportion to the measure of its bulk and height.

The heart that cleaveth to the earth cannot raise itself above it. Nations that follow the bent of their own passions may shew cruelty, but can never exhibit greatness. You may compose for them the wisest laws that ever were framed by the wisdom of man; you might as well lay nets to catch ants—for with equal ease will their habitual lusts pass through them. Against ungovernable propensities laws avail not: they are like weak fences to raging lions.—Give to such a nation all the exuberance of riches attainable on earth; they will produce luxury and avarice, but will never ensure relief to the necessities of the orphan and the helpless. sures do not wean the affections of men from riches, but generally unite their hearts more closely to them.—Men of rare talents may appear among such a people, and civilization may thereby be promoted; but great minds darkened by wicked passions have always proved the worst enemies of their country: their principles are seeds of strife and discord, germinating the more readily through the reputation of those that sow them. Human civilization without divine light is the corruption of a nation.—Heroes may arise among them, such as to astonish even the brave; but being animated merely by a desire for personal fame, they are ready, so soon as the acclamations in praise of the conqueror cease, or are bestowed upon another, to sacrifice the interests of their country on the altar of self-love. A general who merely seeks his own fame, desires the well-being of his country no longer than while it procures him glory.—A vast extent of empire, with a great population divided in sentiments, becomes a burden to itself, and at last, by its own weight, sinks into desolation. Look at the pitiable remnants of ancient nations, handed down from age to age, and from one generation to another! These are the only inheritance of greatness now remaining, to countries once renowned and glorious.—Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation: by disunion, city is divided from city, and house from house. Where there is no union of heart among a people, energy in any undertaking cannot be expected: where, moreover, the civil union is not strengthened by the Divine union, the very hand which is stretched out to save becomes an instrument of ruin. Sometimes, it must be confessed, lawless tribes have united in such strength, as to be raised up on high in the sight of many nations: "But they," according to the words of the prophet, "know not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understand they his counsel:" hence they are gathered "as the sheaves unto the floor," and are raised up on high for to be threshed like wheat. And the hand of the Lord having separated from among them the good grain, will make use of it; but the chaff shall be blown up and down upon the face of the earth, among strangers.

A kingdom is established, when union of sentiment pervades it; and when the loyalty of the people is increased and consolidated by godliness. This it is, which constitutes stability in a nation, and exalteth it to the height of glory. Such a union is not broken by commotions, and cannot be cut with the sharp sword, because it is strengthened by the fear of God: it is not relaxed in the time of oppression and grief, because it is yielded in obedience to the commands of the Lord: it flourishes both in peace and in war, conferring substantial honour. Such a union, binding together cities and villages, and the sovereign with his subjects, extends from earth to heaven; because in God it had its beginning, and in him it hath its end.

Loyalty, supported by godliness, contains all that glory which deserves to be prized, and at the sight of which the nations of the earth are astonished. Leaning on eternity, she appeareth in judgment, and is exalted above every thing temporal. In the peasant, she produces a dignity of birth surpassing that of the noble—to the citizen she communicates riches superior to those of the great—to the warrior she gives unconquerable bravery—to the general, heroism, and that according to wisdom. In all conditions she produces obedience; not the obedience of fear, which is that of slaves, but "obedience for conscience sake," as becometh the children of our Father. Union of spirit in a nation is that love which teacheth to lay down our lives for our friends; for love is stronger than death. Wherever this fidelity unites the hearts of the subjects, the laws and regulations of the state will promote wisdom among the people; for loyalty regards them as sacred; and if imperfections (from which no rank is free) are found in them, the deficiency is supplied by the law of God, and by the principles of love enforced therein. Riches and luxury do not make a city truly distinguished; neither do poverty, affliction, and oppression, render it base: provided contentment reign there, its treasury, even though impaired by the hands of an enemy, is presently restored by the joint contributions of all. In such a nation there may not be found that wisdom which dazzles the unthinking; but a Divine light illumines all, and makes even the simple wise, to the confounding of those who prize themselves on account of their worldly wisdom. Some among them, if not many, become so purified in their hearts, that they appear like moving stars upon the earth; shining less gloriously in the daytime than in the dark night, when the joys of the people are damped by misfortunes, and beneficence is straitened by poverty. And though no one should observe their labours for the general good, yet often for their sake the city is saved; nay, perhaps, for the sake of ten of them a whole nation is not destroyed.

Should numerous tribes and nations arm themselves against a kingdom like this, it may, perhaps, suffer and be shaken by their attacks, for a moment; but at last it will triumph over the wicked. In such a nation, not only are those famed for heroic deeds whom the hand of authority places in front of the battle, but the peaceful husbandman becomes animated with martial valour, and the ploughshare and the pruning-hook are turned into instruments of justice against their enemies; yea, even the delicate hands of the weaker sex take up arms, to defend the rights of their native country!*

To you, O hearers, Russians!—to you such deeds are well known, being borne upon your hearts, and upon your lips. It is not chance, sought after by those who are blind; neither is it the art of man, studiously inquisitive; but it is godly fidelity and loyalty that have raised the hearts of our fellow countrymen so high. And if, with mortal eye, we were capable of penetrating into the secrets of Heaven, we should behold, that the wrongs of man, as in the days of Israel, have drawn down upon earth the justice of God; by whose power five have chased a hundred, and a hundred have put ten thousand to flight. In us has been fulfilled the prophecy, once proclaimed to the people of God: "And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh; and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine: and all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour, and thy Redeemer, the Mighty One of Israel."

But as godly fidelity exalteth a nation, so also does the piety of a sovereign exalt his people and himself. The throne of a king is such an elevation, that the eyes of all the subjects are turned towards it. From the well-furnished table of his example, they look to receive nutriment for their own hearts and minds. What they here behold is spoken of in the most distant parts; and those who stand upon the highest steps of the elevation communicate to those who walk upon the earth, whatever they themselves receive. The rulers of the earth can have no secrets: they do not so carefully watch the movements of their subjects, as their subjects watch them, repeat their words, and imitate their manners.

When godliness adorns the throne of a sovereign, and the fear of God guides the sceptre, then not only the kingdom of man, but the kingdom of God is extended upon earth; and the worldly grandeur encompassing the throne shall, sooner or later, be changed for spiritual glory. Duplicity and falsehood will certainly disappear, where every thing is sure of being measured and reckoned up by uncompromising Truth. From the looks of a godly sovereign goeth forth a light and a fire; which, if it do not enlighten and warm, will certainly consume, the hearts of the wicked. No one can be a servant to a monarch who fears God, unless he himself, in some measure, be a servant of God: none can be his friend, unless he be the friend of God also. When the throne rests on such a foundation, not only those who are called preach the Gospel, but even those who proclaim the will of the sovereign propagate godli-Not only such as are placed upon the watchtowers of the Lord, but those who watch over civil rights, become also guardians of the rights of God among the people; and the warrior, in taking down his sword, and rubbing off its dust, feels his heart, at the same time, brightened with love to his sovereign and to his native country. In the midst of such a people, the mouth of wickedness is shut, not only by the strength of the laws, but because the craftiness of iniquity is despised. Infidelity, losing the protection of the great, hides itself in obscurity, and vanishes. Unanimity, moreover, is promoted, and justice is exalted, where every one is rewarded according to his works and his abilities.

If the greatness of a people is to be measured by godliness, then the true love of a sovereign to his people must consist in protecting and exalting godliness. By this power alone, a sovereign may lead many millions of his subjects to the rest of God, and bestow those blessings spoken of in the Scriptures:—"The king by judgment establishes the land." And though many among the multitude should still bow before the idol of Vanity, though he should even find none to follow his example, yet shall he nevertheless, by his fidelity to God, exalt himself.

But the service of God is not the service of self; neither is it a slavery of which the feeble-minded need be afraid: it is liberty, assured by the Spirit of God. In the servant of God the raging passions are quenched, that the light of God may spring up in his heart: he throws off the fear of man, because he has put on the fear of God, which overcometh every other fear. He that is faithful towards God, in contrition of heart offers up his spirit a sacrifice to Him: instead of obeying his own will, he obeys the Divine will. The evening and the morning, the day and the night, the down-lying and the uprising, the outgoing and the in-coming, all are consecrated to the glory of God.

Who will not confess that such service of the Lord, even in the meanest of men, is a heavenly elevation—is a link connecting man with God? But if all virtuous actions increase in value, in proportion to the extent of their influence, and are glorious in proportion to the difficulties surmounted in their attainment, then with what greatness and glory shall the sovereign be clothed who faithfully serves God, sitting upon the throne where the corrupt passions work so powerfully, dazzling him amid its splendors, and deceiving him by their subtlety; whose temptations increase with the numbers by whom he is surrounded; whose independence frees him from those restraints which bind the lower orders; and whom abundance invites to a profusion from which others are withheld by want of means. The highest elevation of Christianity, if it can be exalted by man, is witnessed in the person of the truly Christian sovereign; because there it is exalted by heaven and earth, and the blessing of God and of nations rests upon him. A sovereign faithful towards God is also faithful in love to his people: delivering his own spirit and heart into the hands of God, he takes into his own hands the hearts of his people, that he may guide them in the ways that are right. The Lord thus bestows upon him hidden and invisible treasures, which cannot be obtained either by gold, or art, or power.

If we examine still nearer all the qualities of such fidelity to God, we shall find that the Lord holdeth his anointed by the right hand, goeth before him, and maketh crooked places straight. What precepts of men can teach humility, where there is nothing to restrain the severest exercise of authority and power? What force of reasoning can instil meekness, when from all quarters the voice of adulation is heard? Is it possible to expect the renunciation of glory, where the law of honour and the thirst for glory are placed among civil virtues?

But let us penetrate further into the wonderful ways of God. When this faithful servant of the King of Kings takes the field against his enemies, then dread and fear fall upon the nations under heaven, that all may know the superior strength of godliness. If the arms of the warriors should become weak, and the blood of the innocent must not be shed, then the heavens rain down stones in aid of him; the atmosphere is armed with powers of heat or frost; or, as of old for the sake of Israel, the earth openeth its bowels, and sendeth forth an unexpected army—myriads of creeping things, to overcome the enemy. The sovereign who is faithful in the cause of God, like Moses, is exalted by God above the pride of Pharaoh: he is meek, and therefore, like David, he is mysteriously and continually anointed by the Spirit of God: a lover of peace, and attentive to the house of God, like Solomon, he is renowned in all parts of the world: to him the promise of the Lord is fulfilled—"I will make my first-born higher than the kings of the earth."

Do you not at once recognise, O hearers! these marks of true greatness in our pious monarch, bestowed upon him by God? O happy Russians! let us bless God, who is so bountiful and gracious towards us. We cannot, indeed, with the eye of sense, follow the Spirit of God: it is sufficient that we are instructed by the voice of Providence, by whose power righteousness has been made manifest in the days of our beloved monarch. When, even among Christians, the glory of Christ the Saviour began to decay, our sovereign, by the voice of his power, proclaimed it; engaging, in imitation of the king of Israel, to raise a Temple as a monument to His glory. When public opinion, led on by self-sufficiency, and fearful of offending man, offended God, by ascribing to the skill of man His mighty acts, the humble conqueror of the raging enemy proclaimed the truth before the multitude of the people, saying, like David: 'God himself is our conductor: thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty!' Not only within the limits of our native land, but among strange nations, truth shone forth from the sceptre of our monarch. The bonds of slavery, which force had imposed, are cut asunder by the just operations of his arms; and, as by his justice he has delivered men from a temporal yoke, he may also become the means of bestowing upon strangers deliverance from eternal bondage.

In his day, righteousness hath shone forth: and already, as it has been made evident by the ten visible plagues for the deliverance of ten kingdoms, the head of Modern Egypt is bruised. But pride is not yet humbled—the great work is not yet finished. Let us offer up our prayers, O hearers! to the God of peace, that, in the steps of justice, abundance of peace may be maintained, from the east to the west, from the north to the south; that the troubles of the nations may be stilled, and the blood of man may cease to flow.

If not in foreign kingdoms, O hearers! at least among ourselves, much peace shall abound, if we live godly lives, faithful to our sovereign and our country—if we prefer not the service of vanity and self to the service of God;—then the words of the eternal decree assure us, that the Lord will bless his people with peace.

BY AMBROSIUS, LATE METROPOLITAN OF ST. PETERSBURG AND NOVOGOROD.

GOOD MASTER, WHAT GOOD THING SHALL I DO, THAT I MAY HAVE ETERNAL LIFE?

It is a salutary thing, in this mortal state, to desire life everlasting; and it is highly necessary, during our pilgrimage in this world, to consider betimes of the way to that which is to come, and of the means by which we may reach it; for our present life is merely a sojourn in a foreign land, as David terms it, from which we must return to the eternal house of our Father who is in heaven; -- "knowing," saith the apostle St. Paul, "that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: for we must all appear before the judgmentseat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." The want of a proper knowledge of this way will leave us in a difficulty, like that of the young man mentioned in this day's Gospel. How shall we appear uncondemned before the judgment-seat of Christ? or, to use the words of the youth, "What good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?"

We need not be surprised that this difficulty should be felt; for even holy men of old, turning unto God with a similar petition, exclaimed: "Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk: teach me to do thy will!" "Teach me thy way, O Lord! I will walk in thy truth." It is impossible for the weakness of corrupt human nature to do otherwise than confess, with the holy apostle St. Paul, "What I would, that I do not; and how to perform that which is good, I find not." To whom, then, can we flee with such encouraging hopes, as unto God, requesting that he would instruct our judgment and direct our will in the path of eternal life?

It is true, we have not the precious opportunity which the youth mentioned in the Gospel had, of asking the Saviour, face to face, concerning this matter; but we have his word in the Scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation. "Search the Scriptures," saith he himself; "for in them ye think ye have eternal life." Let us, therefore, search in them, what is the way that leadeth unto life eternal.

But let us beware of commencing such an inquiry in the spirit and with the views of the youth here mentioned; for, according to the opinion of interpreters, he made this inquiry without faith and trust in the merits of Christ as the Saviour of the human race; and considering him only as a good teacher among men, he was curious to know his opinions. Hence he did not call him "Saviour," but only "Good Teacher." Moreover, he desired ostentatiously to exalt himself and his own merits, as having fulfilled all the commandments of the law: and on this account, when the Saviour said to him, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments," he proudly, and without a blush, replied, "All these things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet?" Proud youth! he understood the law, but he knew not his own heart. Yet the heartsearching Saviour, who could easily have put him to shame by discovering all his imperfections, only disclosed to him his darling sin—a sin against the chief commandment of love to our neighbour—which consisted in an inordinate love of riches. "If thou wilt be perfect," said Jesus to him—'for, with all thy self-praise, thou hast not yet attained to this—try thyself by a single act more," go sell what thou hast, and give to the poor." This single proposal was sufficient to confound the self-conceited youth, who imagined he could reach eternal life by his own works. Hence, as the evangelist Matthew declares, "when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions."

Let us beware, I say, of seeking the way of salvation with such an attachment to the perishable goods of this world, and with such a dependence upon our own good works and merits, as we observe in this selfpraising youth. It is true, Jesus Christ, in his advice to him, does not exclude good works from the number of the means of salvation; for he said to him, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." And, indeed, this was the way to eternal life which God at first appointed for both angels and men. In their state of innocency, they all were, by their works, and they might have for ever remained, well-pleasing to their Maker and Father. But as, through pride of their own powers and merits, the angels fell, so was the nature of the first man corrupted, by a desire to become as gods, knowing good and evil. From this root, weakened by falling into sin, still weaker branches sprang up in the posterity of man. For as the Scripture saith, "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt! for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." As sin increased, God, of his goodness, was pleased to increase those restraints which might preserve mortals from falling into it. But, as in a disordered stomach even the most wholesome food yields bad secretions, so also the corrupt nature of man has turned even the commandments of God into his greater condemnation. "The law entered," saith the apostle Paul, "that the offence might abound; and the commandment which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death." Moreover, viewing the law as a covenant, the justice of God required the perfect fulfilment of it. "Cursed is every one," saith God, "that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." "Whosoever shall keep the whole law," saith the holy apostle James, "and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." After this, what justification can feeble man expect from the law? By it, he is accursed and condemned. What merit can we find in our works? "If we say that we have no sin," saith the apostle John, "we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." What merit can we discover, even where we might most reasonably look for it, in our very righteousness? for "all our righteousnesses," saith Isaiah, "are as filthy rags." Finally, supposing that we could fulfil the whole law, even this, before God, were no more than our duty, and would contain no merit. "When," saith the Saviour, "ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do." And thus, not by any good qualities of ours—because, if we have any, we have received them of God; for "what hast thou, which thou didst not receive?" saith the apostle:—not by any kind of personal merits—for what we have done right before God, it was our duty to perform; and "who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again?" saith the same apostle:—not by any kind of good works of ours, that are all imperfect—for "who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from sin?" saith Solomon:—never, I say, by any of these weak and imperfect means can we have any hope of reaching eternal life.

When the youth, mentioned in the Gospel, commended himself to Jesus Christ as having kept all the commandments, the Saviour said unto him, "Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor." Now, even supposing that he had done this also, still he would have lacked what was needful to salvation: for Jesus Christ, in concluding, added another commandment, which only could complete the whole: "... and come, follow me!" This is the only way that leads us to salvation. "I am the door," said the Saviour; "by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved. I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me. I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." Hence it is evident, that our best works cannot promote our salvation, but when they are performed in following Christ, and are perfected by his grace. Our justification is by grace, and not by our good works; for, according to the apostle Paul, we are "justified freely by his grace." 'If (saith the same apostle) I should desire to glory in the acquirements and deeds of the law, I might boast above others: circumcised the eighth day, according to the law; as a real Jew, and not as foreigners who are circumcised when adults; of the stock of Israel; of the most distinguished tribe of Benjamin; an Hebrew of the Hebrews; and, as touching the law, a follower of the strictest sect of the Pharisees. My zeal for the honour of the law went so far, that I became a persecutor of the Christians;—and, in short, touching the righteousness which is in the law, I was blameless. But all these privileges and merits I now confess to be nothing. The knowledge of Christ surpasses all these advantages; and I count them all but dung, that I may win Christ; for I seek justification, not by the law, but by faith in Jesus Christ. I desire to be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.' See Phil. iii. 4—10.

But let no one imagine, that because, in following Christ, we are redeemed from the curse of the law, we are therefore freed from the obligation to fulfil its duties. Jesus Christ came, not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it; and therefore, as his beloved disciple declares, "He that saith I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him, verily, is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him."

Let us then follow Jesus Christ, who leadeth us to eternal life;—but let us also follow his example by the way. He is not only our Leader, but our Teacher; not only the Mediator of our salvation, but also a Pattern to his followers. Our trust in his merits will be fruitless, if we do not walk worthy of the vocation by which we are called: yea, his very merits will enhance the condemnation of his unworthy followers. Even the Church of Christ, according to the words of St. Paul, repudiates them. "The earth, which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God. But that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is, to be burned." From such a miserable end may the Saviour himself preserve us all, by his grace! Amen!

THE PRODIGAL SON.

LUKE XV. 21.

FATHER, I HAVE SINNED AGAINST HEAVEN, AND IN THY SIGHT!

When the time drew near in which the grace of God, according to the New Covenant, should be revealed in the world, then John, the Forerunner of Christ, called upon all to repent. "Repent ye! for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." And on the approach of the holidays of the fortieth week after Pentecost, our mother, the Church of Christ, instead of such a call, presents us with a lively example of the manner in which we ought to repent, in the parable of the Prodigal Son.

If we attentively examine our hearts, who among us will not find in himself some resemblance to the Prodigal Son? Ungrateful to his father, weary of living under his controul, he required his dismissal, and his own share of the inheritance; and departing to a far country, he there spent all his substance in riotous living. Who has not received, from the hands of a generous Heavenly Father, some gifts as his own portion? How many possess them in abundance! And who among us has not, in one way or other, made an improper use of them, to his own hurt, and to the injury of others? But though we all, in one way or other, imitate the Prodigal Son in his sins, alas! we resemble him not in his return; yea, we know not what it is to copy his example of repentance and conversion; we do not so much as comprehend the aim of this Gospel parable. Therefore doth our mother, the Holy Church, thus admonish us to-day—'Brethren, let us confess the mystery of power; let us hearken to the Scriptures, concerning the Prodigal—afterwards the Chaste; and may we, through faith, imitate his good example! With humility of heart, let us pray unto him who knoweth the secrets of us all: Bountiful Father! we have sinned against thee, and are no more worthy to be called thy children; yet, as thou, according to thy nature, lovest the children of men, receive us, and make us thy hired servants!'

In obedience to this admonition of the Holy Church, we shall consider, in the present discourse, the manner in which we ought to proceed, in repenting and turning unto God.

There are two principal causes of our cleaving to sin, and delighting in it. The first is, a deceived imagination; and the second, fascinated senses. Both these causes work in us during our whole lives: yet they operate most powerfully in youth; because, when the faculties of the mind are beginning to ripen, then every thing which we have not tried becomes an object of curiosity, and every thing which we have already experienced becomes to us tiresome and burthensome. The imagination is excited by untried pleasures, and the senses seek for unknown gratification. Inexperienced reason dares not, yea, understands not how, to oppose these attractions: she thinks, that in following them, she shall not forsake the right path of judgment. Unfortunate is the youth who, at this age, has not an experienced and watchful monitor! But frequently, even then, he is unsuccessful in resisting a heated imagination and inflamed passions. We have a most lively example of this presented to us to-day, in the parable of the Prodigal Son. He was educated in the house of a wise father, who loved his children: he enjoyed all that children can enjoy in the house of a wealthy parent: he had no privations. But on his coming of age, he felt that he was not at liberty to live as he desired, and that he had not the means in his own power to gratify his extravagance. "Father," says this son, "give me the portion of goods that falleth to me;"—and having received his portion, he departs into a far country, and there soon wastes his substance with riotous living.

Behold the fruits of following a fascinated imagination, ungovernable passions, and inexperienced reason! Happy was it for this youth, that his riches did not last long; because he would have become hardened in wickedness, and unfit for repentance and reform. Happy are all those who, like him, soon have an opportunity, and soon feel a desire, to cool their imagination and their passions, and begin rationally to look into them-But whether soon or late, we cannot turn and repent in any other way, than in that by which the Prodigal Son repented. Let him, then, who is already fallen, examine the steps of his fall; and, recollecting how kind his heavenly Father has been in furnishing him with many gifts and tokens of his goodness, let him think of his own ingratitude, in abusing that goodness, and in being dissatisfied with the provisions of his Father's house; in having left it, fled to a distance, and plunged into worldly vanities and temptations.

Oh! how blind are we, in forsaking the light of his law, and fleeing to the darkness of error! How unfeeling! For though, on every side, we hear his merciful voice, calling us to his arms, yet, instead of complying, we throw ourselves into the arms of vice.— How inconsiderate, that we, who are the most noble work of God's hands, and placed in honour by him, should have assimilated ourselves to unthinking beasts, led by the workings of their passions! How daring, to have presumed to disobey the will of him who is the supreme Lord of the Universe! How wretched, in having lost the good-will of him who "turneth his face away and we are troubled!"—Considerations of this kind naturally lead to contrition of heart, which is the beginning of true repentance. Hence the Prodigal Son, when he came to himself, felt the value of the blessings of his father's house, and, from contrition of heart, exclaimed, "I will arise, and go to my father!"

But this contrition of heart should arise, not so much from regret at having lost the benefit of innocence, or from fear of the Divine punishment, as from a filial sorrow at having offended our most merciful and beneficent Father. Esau sorrowed and repented, who had for one morsel of meat sold his birth-right: but, as the holy apostle Paul saith, "he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears;" because he only regretted the loss of his birthright in the family, and not the loss of his father's blessing. Judas, the betrayer, sorrowed and repented, exclaiming, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood!" and he cast down the pieces of silver in the Temple. But he only dreaded the punishment of God: it was not the goodness of God that led him to repent-The Prodigal, on the contrary, in the parable which has been this day read, returned to his father, not through fear of deserved punishment, neither from any idea of his filial rights; but from an assurance of his father's mercy. He accounted it a much greater blessing to live in his father's house—though not as a son, but as a servant—than to live in a distant land in the greatest liberty. "Father," exclaimed he, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son! Make me as one of thy hired servants!" Of this kind must our repentance also be.

Further, this reformation should not be temporary only, but constant and stedfast. It is nothing strange to see a man, in the midst of trials, or when suffering from the consequences of former sin, repenting in sorrow of heart; yea, there are few who do not, at some time or other, repent in this way. But this kind of repentance does not produce reformation of life: such persons more frequently resemble those Israelites in the wilderness, of whom the Scriptures bear testimony, that, "when God slew them, then they sought him, and they returned and inquired early after God, and they remembered that God was their Rock, and that the High God was their Redeemer: nevertheless, they did flatter him with their mouths, and they lied unto him with their tongues; for their heart was not right with him." Concerning such penitents, the apostle Peter says, "The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire." The repentance of the Prodigal Son, of whom we have read, was of a different kind. He returned to his father's house, and never left it again to go into a far country.—Nevertheless, the corruption of human nature will not allow us to be entirely free from sin in this life: for, according to the testimony of wise Solomon, "A just man falleth seven times in a day, and riseth again." David, however, says, "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down; for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." And if our merciful Lord commands us to forgive our neighbour that sinneth against us until seventy times seven times, will he not forgive those who have sinned a thousand times and truly repent? — Moreover, an unhesitating reliance on the grace of our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, and a living faith in his merits, will powerfully preserve us from falling into sin, and will stablish us in holiness, through the regeneration of the Holy Ghost. For his beloved disciple assures us, that "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." If, then, we be conscious to ourselves that our imagination and senses are still seduced by sin, and that, too frequently, we are the slaves of it, these are proofs that we are not yet born again by the Spirit of Jesus Christ: and if we be not regenerated, then it is evident that we do not possess a vital faith in our Redeemer, and a steady trust in the strength of his grace, which is made perfect in human weakness. And if we have neither living faith nor a steady reliance upon the Redeemer, then no repentance of ours can either be hopeful on our part, or satisfactory before God; because, according to the confession of the apostle Paul, though we of ourselves may have a desire of good, yet we have not the ability of continuing in it. "For to will is present with me," saith he; "but how to perform that which is good, I find not." And hence, by faith we are justified before God, and not by works. "Therefore we conclude," saith the same apostle, "that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." Our good works are only the effects and fruits of our faith.

On approaching to the salutary days of the fast, pious hearers, let us prepare our hearts to repentance, by reflection on our sins; which banish us, like the Prodigal Son, from the house of our gracious Father! Let us be stedfast in spirit, in turning to him for ever! Let us flee to his merciful arms in contrition and repentance! The holy church is the house where he awaits our coming to him. The ministers and stewards of the mysteries of God are door-keepers, who open to you the entry into his feast. The mystery of absolution is the best robe, the ring upon the finger, the shoes upon the feet, in which the Prodigal was welcomed, as a beloved son, into the house of his father. The holy Eucharist is that fatted calf which is slain for the supper of joy and mirth, at the return of the repenting sinner. Let us, therefore, leave the husks, and return to our gracious Father; and, like the Prodigal Son, say unto him, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight!" Amen!

SERMON VI.

EPHESIANS IV. 5.

THERE IS ONE LORD, ONE FAITH, ONE BAPTISM, ONE GOD AND FATHER OF ALL, WHO IS ABOVE ALL, AND THROUGH ALL, AND IN YOU ALL.

As the natural visible light, shining with enlightening power upon all, gives to every thing in the system of the world its own proper colour, and form, and beauty; and as every thing is revealed in all its goodliness, only when the glorious sun brightens it with its cheering rays; so the light of God, the power of the Holy Spirit, gives to every word, which proceeds from his illumination, great power and energy. Every word in the holy Scriptures, every link in that chain formed of the prophetical doctrine, and of the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, has its value, being enlightened by the rays of Divine revelation—has an excellence and energy, and draws after it a great chain of practical consequences: for example, the doctrine of the apostle now read includes something of the highest importance, and affords the most weighty instruction. The holy apostle says, "There is one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." There is one God who is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end (Rev. i. 8) of all; who, having himself neither beginning nor end, continues always to exist in his own eternal circle, without the aid of any other being; always lives in his own inaccessible light, being himself the supreme light. There is one God and Father of all—he is the Father of his whole visible and invisible creation, the Father of angels and men, the Creator of all things animate and inanimate, the Creator of heaven and earth, and of all things in them and upon them. There is one God and Father of all, who is above all—possessing his own mighty power; through all—shewing his all-wise government; in all—manifesting the glory of his own goodness.

"There is one Lord"—the true Son of God—Jesus Christ—the merciful Samaritan, who turned aside from the lofty dwelling-place of heaven, came down into this miserable sickly valley, and despised not fallen man, who, travelling from Jerusalem to Jericho, had fallen among thieves—into the hands of Satan, and of sin and its progeny—had been stripped by them—stripped of his original beauty, the holy image of God, the magnificent and precious garments of his light, the grand ornaments of eternal perfection and of inward endowments and virtues; —man, fallen into the deplorable image of the flesh and of the devil—into filthy carnal passions and satanical pride—all wounded and sore, in soul and body, in reason, will, and heart—bruised disordered, and receiving no aid, or advantage, or alleviation, either from Priests or Levites—from the law of Moses, or from the ancient sacrifices appointed by the Law. This man, poor, and wretched, and stripped of his former glory, he did not despise nor reject, but regarded him with pity and mercy: he came from heaven -became incarnate-suffered and died-bound up his wounds, and healed him with his own blood—took him —lifted him up, and brought him to the inn—into his own church—united him to his own body, and gave money that he might be restored to soundness—gave him the holy ordinances, and divers gifts of the Spirit; these he gave, when he had ascended up to heaven.

"There is one Spirit"—the Spirit of God—the Spirit possessing, with God the Father and God the Son, glory, greatness, power, and dominion. There is one Spirit, who perfects every one thus called by the Son of God, and brought into the church and cured there. He perfects him, by kindling in him a strong desire for salvation—perfects him, by bestowing upon him faith and love towards his Redeemer—perfects him, by cleansing him from the wounds of sin—perfects him, by sanctifying him with his own strength, and giving him ability for the true service of God—for the performance of Christian virtues, and for the indwelling of God himself; in a word, for his spiritual union with him—for the union of his human nature with the Deity.

"There is one faith"—faith in God the Father, the Creator—in God the Son, the Redeemer—in God the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier and enlightener, who perfects our creation and redemption. One faith—that medium of salvation by which we are justified—by which alone justification through Christ is applied for our salvation: by which faith we have in ourselves a lively persuasion of the reality both of the unseen things revealed in the Gospel, and also of the expected blessings; and from which are produced in us the fruits of righteousness.

"There is one body"—composed of different members, both large and small; consisting of the external, tending to use; as well as of the internal and essential, tending to the unity and perfection of the whole. All who are regenerated by the Spirit of God are one body, of whom our Lord Jesus Christ is the Head. There is one church, of all who believe in Christ—a church collected from the east and west, and called out of all nations—the true church, founded upon the truth of the Gospel, consecrated and sanctified by the one Holy Spirit—the universal general church, of all Jews and Gentiles; who, in different nations, ranks, tribes, and ages, are constituted members of it, without regard to any of these distinctions: for now in it there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, but every one, if only a true believer, has a part and a place therein as a true member of it. There is, I say, a universal apostolical church, founded upon the chief corner-stone, Jesus Christ, and built up and established by the doctrine of the prophets and of the apostles.

There is likewise "one baptism"—of water and of the Spirit—the pool of Siloam, in which men lying thirty or fifty years afflicted with spiritual diseases are made whole—the universal remedy, by which sin is cured that divine eye-salve (Rev. iii. 18), or holy ointment, by means of which the scales fall from the eyes; by which the darkness of the mind vanishes, and the whole inner man is enlightened, and is made to see, as the evangelist John affirms—that spiritual warmth, in which, as in a fire, the old man (the man characterized by the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life—the outer building of the fleshly "hay and stubble" 1 Cor. iii. 12—15, whose actions are abominable) this man is burnt, dies, and exists no more; and the inner man begins to exist—is quickened—regenerated—rises up and acts-performs works tried in the fire, as gold and silver, and precious stones, which cannot be consumed—he is raised up, and clothed in the image of God, which consists of righteousness and truth. There is one baptism, that mystical secret door, through which the believer enters into the visible church militant in time, and then into the invisible church triumphant and glorified with Christ in eternity.

There is one God and Father of all—one Lord, one Spirit, one body, one faith, and one baptism: and since all is one, there is the one divine hypostasis, and all proceeds from this eternal unity. What follows from this?—the most important conclusion. What is it?—namely, this:—

That since there is one God and Father of all, one Lord and one Spirit, there ought to be, amongst us and in us who are endued with the above-mentioned gifts of the Three-one God, no division, no separation into a multitude of different images and diverse spirits. There ought to be in us neither the image of beasts, nor the image of the devil: there ought to be in us no beastly, fleshly passions, such as gluttony, drunkenness, luxury, lasciviousness; nor hellish, satanical qualities, such as pride, malice, envy, and obstinacy: there ought to be in us neither the spirit of pride, nor of malice, avarice, adultery, hatred, or false witnessing; but there ought to be the holy eternal unity of God. The ringleader in all division is Satan: he, the first rebel against God, was driven away from him; and he it was who brought dissension, discord, opposition, and war, both into the visible world and into the invisible. God is the author of unity; and if ever we wish to be children of God, worthy of fellowship with him, his accepted servants, his believing, redeemed sons, and partakers of his all-holy Spirit, then, undoubtedly, we must have in ourselves a spirit of union, both with God and our neighbour. spirit of union must rule us wholly—all our actions, all our words, all our thoughts; and not the spirit of the world, or the flesh, or the wicked serpent. We must be servants of the one merciful, kind, generous Lord, and not servants of different spiritual masters; not ministers of the world, or the flesh, or sin, or the devil. We must be true servants of the one true God; and not servants of idols, or of the world, or of the flesh and the passions; and not servants of Satan.

Since there is one body, and since we are all members of Christ's one body; since we all belong to the one spiritual constitution, of which our Lord Jesus Christ is the head; then the one spirit—the Spirit of God—must quicken us, and work in us one mind—the mind of the Lord, the mind of the all-wise God: this must rule us, and produce in our actions one will. The will of Christ must regulate our will, must choose and order what we must do, and what we must not do: the one food—the true doctrine of Christ, the living word of God-must nourish us; and the spirit of opposition to God must not live in us. Our blind reason must not govern us, and our perverted wills are not to exercise an imperious sway The apples of Sodom must not be our food. Since we are members of the one body of Christ, we must, as such, yield our members, "not to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, but to righteousness unto holiness," that we may be blameless, and not abominable members. The pure body of Christ must consist of pure members, and not of the members of harlots, drunkards, extortioners, evil-doers, and brutish persons. Since we are the members of one body, then we must have a very strong bond, agreement, and love among ourselves: there ought to abide with all of us, peace, kindness, magnanimity, patience, humility, and other fruits of the love of God. We must all have one spirit. None of us, however rich or exalted in rank, or of high birth, ought to be proud or to despise others: but we must love and respect the feeblest members of the body of Christ, as equally necessary with ourselves; although in appearance dishonourable, must give them the more abundant honour; although in appearance uncomely, must respect them in a becoming manner. There ought not to be in one body dissensions, disputing, oppressing, grudging against one another; but let all the members sorrow when one member suffers: when it is diseased by some sinful malady, let all the members suffer with it: all ought to grieve on its account, and not to reproach, detest, and despise it; and all ought to endeavour to promote its recovery. And when one member is honoured and brought to a state of soundness, then all ought to rejoice with it.

Since there is one holy, universal, and apostolical church, always and everywhere, in every age and in every place, we ought therefore not to seek it only in particular places—either in closets, or in hermitages, or in deserts. "The true worshippers," saith Christ, "worship neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem," but in every part of his invisible church; in the service of which men ought not to separate themselves one from another; and there should be no opposition, discord, or division, even in outward appearance. The true worshippers must be agreed in the service of God: they must be worshippers in spirit and in truth, in peace and love, not breaking that peace by difference in some external signs and ceremonies, which, in themselves, are dead, and cannot communicate life.

Since there is one faith and one baptism, and we are all called in one hope of our calling, and to one end of it, we ought to be of one true believing spirit, without any mixture of gross superstitions or devilish unbelief: we must be of a believing spirit with regard to all that the holy Scriptures reveal to us, not joining to them our own unfounded opinions and erroneous explanations. All must seek their own salvation by real faith and lively trust in the merits of Christ; and not by their outward actions, or by their outward engagements in the service of God. But, as we ought to be of one spirit, so we ought also to do the same kind of actions: the one will of God, the one mind of Christ, the one food of his doctrine, ought to produce in us the same actions, since we are come into the one body of Christ, into his one church, and have confirmed the mystery of baptism by our own solemn engagement. These ought to be the spiritual works of all Christians: they should renounce the devil, and all his works—all the pride of himself and all his angels: they should renounce the world and its lusts, in thought, word, and deed; and in very deed, dying to it wholly, putting to death the flesh upon the cross of repentance. All our spiritual Christian actions should be done in union with Christ, by a living faith in him, and because we sincerely love him. The Christian is one who casts away from him the love of the world and the love of the flesh, cleansing himself from all filthiness of the flesh, and breaking himself loose from the fetters of sin; joined with Christ by being clothed with the splendid garment, the clothing of the light of Christ, in the image of God, which is truth and righteousness; having for his object the love of God and his neighbour; shewing his union to Christ by doing his works, in all things imitating him, fulfilling this his gracious command, "Go, and do thou likewise;" joined to him by being enlightened with his light, and sanctified by the power of his Spirit:—these fruits our faith ought to produce in us; to this our baptism obliges us. This living testimony of our love to Christ follows our lively hope in Christ, of receiving, through his merits, the purchased kingdom. We all ought to manifest such obedience and such actions, notwithstanding the difference of our calling, or country, or outward accomplishments, or mental endowments. As, in the spiritual invisible kingdom, the holy angels, those spiritual fellow-servants and heavenly powers, although they possess different ranks, some of them being highest, others of a middle rank, and others lowest, and with different perfections and endowments, have, so to speak, different outward duties belonging to God's government of this world; while their inward actions, the actions which have a reference to God himself, are of the same kind, and they become, by peace, love, and obedience, more assimilated to God in purity, enlightened by his light and knowledge, and thus more and more perfected: so, in like manner, the one faith and one baptism, love to Christ, and hope of a future life, require from us that we should, notwithstanding our different outward callings, different ranks and dignities, and the difference of the duties we have to perform in civil society, (for, notwithstanding difference of qualifications, and endowments, and country, we all have the same inward actions, although in different degrees;) all endeavour after the same spirit in peace and love, putting off the old, the earthy man, Adam, and putting on the new man, the Lord from heaven, Jesus Christ. (1 Cor. xv.47.) All die, as to the flesh; and they live, and are cleansed and sanctified, and brought to perfection, by the Spirit. These same actions, and unity of spirit with God and their neighbour, are required of every true This unity must, without fail, be in him; it is only by his inward union that he can know or have confidence that he has any fellowship with the one God and Father, with the one Lord Jesus Christ, and with his one Spirit—have fellowship in the one body of Christ, in the one faith and baptism, and in the one hope of future life, to the enjoyment of which we are called—have fellowship with the eternal unity of God. The divine beloved disciple of Christ, John the Evangelist, affirms, that every one that hath this hope in the one God the Father, in his Son Jesus Christ, and in his Holy Spirit, through one faith, one baptism, and as in one church, that every one (I say) having this hope has in him a unity of spirit and action; walks even as our Redeemer walked; purifies himself, even as he is pure; and must be righteous, even as he is righteous; must love God and his neighbour, even as he loved us, and gave us his Holy Spirit. In every one who trusts in the Three-one God, there ought to be this unity of spirit and action; and in no degree ought there to be in him divisions, passions, and vices, the renouncing of the will of God, and cleaving to the will of the devil: there ought not to be in him any of the various forms of the satanical progeny of sin.

"Little children,"—thus does St. John further exhort them to unity—"let no man deceive you!" Have we fellowship with him, if we walk in darkness, doing the works of sin? No; "we lie, and do not the truth. He that saith, 'I know him,' and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him; he hath neither seen Christ, nor known him;" neither is there in him the love of the Father. He who in his heart loves the world, and the things that are in the world—as silver, gold, honour and praise, and licentious works, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life—abides not in the unity of God; he sins, and sins without repentance and conversion.

Every one who committeth sin transgresseth the law; for sin is the transgression of the law. Every one that committeth sin, the work of devilish discord, is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.

He that is born of God, of his unity, sinneth not; for the seed of his living word remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God: but he that sinneth, hath not been born of God, but is a child of the devil: and the apostle finally concludes, that always, and everywhere, and in all cases, the children of God and the children of the devil are thus made manifest. Amen!

SERMON VII.

BY MICHAEL, LATE METROPOLITAN OF ST. PETERSBURG AND NOVOGOROD.

SINCE SALVATION IS BY FAITH, WHAT PLACE IS TO BE ASSIGNED TO GOOD WORKS?

EPHESIANS IL 8, 9.

BY GRACE ARE YE SAVED, THROUGH PAITH; AND THAT NOT OF YOUR-SELVES; IT IS THE GIFT OF GOD: NOT OF WORKS, LEST ANY MAN SHOULD BOAST.

As Almighty God created the worlds, both visible and invisible, and, by his powerful word, called into existence intelligent beings, both spiritual invisible angels, and visible corporeal men; for this end, moreover, that angels in heaven, and men in paradise upon earth, might glorify the name and wisdom of God, and, while they fulfilled his holy will, might observe his goodness and loving-kindness displayed in their creation, might enjoy his blessedness, and receive out of the fulness of his light, his glory and his perfections—in a word, that they might live in happiness for ever: so it was with the same design that God, full of mercy, sent his own Word, his own Son, into the world, after men fell, that he might become incarnate, be born of a pure virgin, live a life of sorrow, suffer death, and rise again from the dead, to redeem the human race; that he might deliver it from punishment and eternal death, incurred by falling from that holy will of God, which men were commanded to obey; that he might restore man to the original state of glory and perfection which he enjoyed before his fall; in short, that he might again confer upon him spiritual and eternal life and blessedness. For this end, then, our Lord Jesus Christ came into the world; to save men from works of enmity, and bring them into his heavenly kingdom. This he hath, by his grace, accomplished: by his own death he hath vanquished the enemy and his power: he hath overcome hell, and abolished eternal death. By offering himself in sacrifice, he hath reconciled man to God, opened for him an entrance into his kingdom and glory, and rendered it again possible to have fellowship with God. All this he hath done, not on account of any merit in man—for man could merit nothing but death; but solely of the free grace of God. It was only, as the apostle Paul declares, that "God, who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he hath loved us," in mercy alone sent his Son into the world, even when all "were dead in trespasses and sins; and hath quickened us together with Christ, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, that in the ages to come might be shewn the exceeding riches of the grace" of the Father. (Eph. ii. 4—7.) Salvation is solely by his merits—solely by his grace. According to the declaration of Paul, then, O Christians! we cannot be saved, otherwise than by faith, trusting in the merits of Christ alone—by fellowship in his death. Our salvation is "not of works, lest any man should boast," but solely by faith; "and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God:" consequently, our salvation lies wholly in Jesus Christ. Faith in Christ saves us. "A man is not justified by the works of the law, but only by the faith of Jesus Christ."

But since we are saved by faith, what place do good works hold in reference to our salvation, and whence arises the necessity for them? This we shall endeavour to shew, in the present discourse.

Man, the only intelligent creature of the visible world, now fallen from a state of purity into a state of corruption, having forsaken the holy will of God for his own wicked inclinations, became dead in his inner man, "dead in trespasses and sins;" and, as he was dead before Christ's coming into the world, so, even now that Christ is come, he remains dead until quickened by the Holy Spirit, and is therefore incapable of doing any thing good. All that carnal, unregenerate man attempts or performs, even if it appear good, yet, when judged according to the principle of the action, is not good. Nothing that he does is done from faith, but from "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of life." He acts either from ambition or self-love, or to please the flesh, and not from faith; but "whatsoever is not of faith, is sin." The carnal man can do nothing but sin; consequently, it is not possible for him to merit salvation by his own works: "not of works" is human salvation, "lest any man should boast." A carnal man, that is, a dead man, not only cannot do what is good; he cannot even will it; he is entirely destitute of spiritual life; he sees not the great beauty of the kingdom of God; he hears not the pleasantness of the celestial harmony; he tastes not the sweetness of paradise; he feels not the excellence of Eden; he knows not true holiness; and hence he wishes not for such blessings. He is guided by sense, and attached only to delusive, pernicious pleasures; hence, the very desire of salvation must be excited in man by the power of God, and it can be excited by nothing else.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, being compassionate towards all in general, is compassionate towards each one in particular. As he visibly invited all to salvation, while he was himself in the world; so now he comes invisibly to each—calls him by name—knocks at his heart by his own word, and invites him to accept of salvation reveals the bondage of sin under which our spiritual being groans, so as to excite some desire of deliverance. And, when this compassionate Samaritan perceives a desire to be saved, in the man lying half dead of the wounds which sin hath made, and gives him faith (which also is not of ourselves, but the gift of God), he enables him, by that faith, to appropriate the salvation to himself —enables him firmly to hope in the merits of Christ; which firm reliance on the merits of Christ, or faith in him, is the foundation on which our salvation rests. It is the gift of God, and is obtained from him by the hearing and hearty reception of his word: "for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." (Rom. x. 17.) Being obtained in such a manner, every thing essential to salvation is provided; and hence the Scripture says that faith saves us.

But this must on our part be productive. Every sinful man, whoever he may be, that is brought to his right mind by the sound of the word of God; roused out of the sleep of sin; leaving off (although for a time) his errors; hearing, while in this state, of Jesus Christ as a Saviour and a healer; every such man must from the heart desire his healing, and, desiring it, must believe on him—must believe that he is, in all respects, the Saviour he needs—that in him alone salvation is to be found—and that he shall assuredly receive all that the Saviour hath promised; and must be so persuaded of this, as no longer to doubt that all shall be fulfilled:

for "faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen." Faith is the cordial trust, accompanied with a lively hope, that the promised blessings shall be received, as though we already saw and actually possessed the unseen things themselves. When God gives to a man such faith, that he can, without doubting, come to him, and repose upon him his confidence, then he must lay open to him all his wounds, all his weakness, all his sins; and seek, with weeping and supplication, and with undoubting faith, that he may be pardoned and cleansed. True living faith is accompanied with prayer, that he may obtain from him, who took upon himself the sins of the whole world, pardon of sin, and cleansing from pollution. This faith heals his wounds, and fetches inward strength from the Spirit of Christ; which moves him out of the state of sin and depravity, and brings into existence the inner man; quickens him from the state of death; and thus he is regenerated. Spiritual strength, obtained by prayer, and apprehended by faith, endues the inner man with power to live, to move, to act, and to perform good works. "In Him," through faith, "we live, and move, and have our being," (Acts xvii. 28.) saith the apostle Paul; because faith receives from the Spirit strength, which it communicates to the inner man, for the production of spiritual works; namely, that we may, with all our heart, love our Creator, and do and submit to his holy will, and likewise do good to our neighbour. It is faith that gives the ability to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit—peace, joy, love, long-suffering, gentleness, continence, chastity, purity, &c. Now since faith yields good works—since they are the effects of faith—then it is clear that they do not save us, but that we are saved by faith which produces them. Although, however, our good works do not save us by themselves, because they cannot exist before faith, but are produced by it, still they have a relation to our redemption through Christ. Besides, they are so small, that they could not atone for our great sins. Faith alone saves us; but good works must be joined with it:—but how?—and wherefore?

Faith in Christ is the foundation of our salvation—it is the beginning of life: and good works must spring from it, to manifest this life: they must serve as marks that the inner man is alive by faith. Wherefore the apostle James saith, "Shew thy faith by thy works" (ch. ii. 18): as if he had said, 'Since ye believe in Christ -since ye consider yourselves redeemed by him, and think that ye have been made alive in your inner man, by faith, then shew your faith, by living through it to good works.' It is the property of life to act. As a human being does not conceive himself, quicken himself, produce himself, but, deriving his being from God through his parents, is born and receives strength to move and act, and, being alive, must act; so, in like manner, the spiritual, the inner man, cannot save himself, cannot regenerate himself, or give himself spiritual and eternal life; but receives it from above, even from the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, through faith (as through his mother). Having spiritual fellowship with Christ by faith; being by him regenerated and restored to life; he must, of necessity, act and perform good and spiritual works; and that, in order to shew and testify that he lives by faith, and is regenerated by it. under the Old-Testament dispensation, the circumcision of the flesh was only a sign of the righteousness of faith in the Messiah—yet such a sign as could not be dispensed with, although the individual himself might be an unrighteous man; so now, under the New Testament, good works, although they do not justify us, must be performed, that they may serve as signs of the right-eousness of faith. Faith, having justified and quickened us, must infallibly produce good works; not for justification, but to shew that faith exists in us: hence it is said, that "faith without works," that is, destitute of the appropriate signs, "is dead:" such faith cannot quicken the man.

But, further, true living faith, appropriating to itself justification through Christ, must produce good works, in testimony of our gratitude to the High and Lofty One, for the blessings he has showered upon us. children love their parents according to the flesh, not in order that they may gain any thing from them, but rather to express their thankfulness for the love and care with which they have nourished them from their birth;—so, in the spiritual birth, we must love God, yield ourselves to his holy will, and do works of righteousness; not to merit the Christian inheritance, the kingdom of God, but rather to express our gratitude to him for the grace which has redeemed us. We must rest assured, that the kingdom of God is not the wages of an hireling, but the gift of God—a generous, gratuitous grant, flowing from the love of God, "of grace," for the sake of Christ. Our love, on the contrary, and other good works, are a debt, and not deserving of any recompence: "We have done that which was our duty to do," (Luke xvii. 10,) saith Christ. 'Do not think that you have performed much, and are worthy of a reward for your service: by no means: but when ye have done all, say, We are unprofitable and useless servants.'

Behold then, Christians, what faith is, and what our works are! See, that our salvation is in Christ alone, depending upon his merit, and obtained, on our part, only by faith, which likewise is the gift of God! See, too, that faith must, without fail, bring along with it good works, and thus prove its own existence, and be an appropriate test of our gratitude to God for our redemption! Let us believe in our Lord Jesus Christ with a true and sincere heart—believe that he is our life and our salvation—believe that we are saved by his grace alone, through faith:—then we shall do good, love Him with all our soul, make all our desires bow to his will, and, according to his commandment, love our neighbour as ourselves;—yield ourselves servants to him in all obedience, to testify to him that we are his grateful children, mindful of his great goodness manifested in our creation, but more especially in redeeming us through the Saviour, our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen!
